Can the Small Farmer Live?

By L. H. Bailey, Professor of Agriculture, Cornell University.

AM asked for my opinion as to whether the small farmer can live. answer by saying that many small farmers are living in comfort and peace of mind. I have recently visited a truck farmer near New York City. He owns thirty acres of land and rents ten acres more. Eighteen years ago he moved on this land with ten acres more. Eighteen years ago he moved on this land with some states of $140 repting the place. Now the land has paid for MARROW") has been made and sold conting the place. a capital of $140, renting the place. Now the land has paid for itself, and the net proceeds of the place run from $1,500 to $1,900 a year, counting only cash sales. Aside from this return should be counted free rent and a good part of the daily living. This case may be unusual, but it is not remarkable. At all events, it shows what can be done.

But I suppose my questioner had in mind to ask whether the farming of the future is to be large-area capitalized farming or small-area specialized farming. It is to be both. Where markets are quick and near-by, small-area farming will increase. The proceeds from fifty acres will be sufficient to provide comfortable support. But the limit of profit will soon be reached on these farms, unless they are devoted to very high-class specialties. The man who is ambitious for large affairs will go farther back to the open country, assemble several farms, employ much labor, organize the business, and apply the kind of generalship that is applied to manufacturing or large merchandizing. More and more, the type of man who now runs a small farm will find it to his advantage to work under the direction of a man of larger executive ability. It will soon be demonstrated that capital can be made to yield profit when put into well-farmed land. Young men with good technical edu cation and first-class executive ability will take the handling of such lands. Small farmers who have technical skill and knowledge, but who lack business ability, will be drawn under the leadership of such men, to the betterment of both. At present every farmer is at the same time a specialist and a business man. Division of labor must/come in farming as it long ago came in commerce.—Collier's.
