Armories, whether in Maine or Maryland, are almost universally built to resemble medieval fortresses, and this one in Cambridge is no exception. A larger but very similar version of the armory in Easton, it is a two-story masonry building with a crenelated roofline. Two square castle turrets are on either side of a shallow projecting bay, which is topped by the Maryland state seal. No longer in active use, the armory serves as a backdrop for new cars displayed by the neighboring automotive dealership.
