WOMAN'S WORLD

Wide service range for social workers

WASHINGTON (NNPA) — The wide range of services provided by social workers, most of whom are women, is suggested by the principal areas of social work. A discussion of these areas follows.

Public assistance workers are employed largely by State and local government agencies or public welfare programs which extend financial assistance to needy persons such as the disabled, blind, or aged; unemployed persons; and dependent children. Their duties include determining their clients' needs and whether they are eligible for financial assistance or other needed social services.

• • •

FAMILY SERVICE workers in private agencies are primarily concerned with providing counseling services to families and individuals. They seek to strengthen family life, by improving interpersonal relationships, and to establish satisfactory relations between the family and community.

Child welfare workers in government and voluntary agencies deal with the problems of children. They may find foster homes or institute legal action for the protection of neglected or mistreated children, arrange for homemaker services during the illness of a mother, arrange for adoptions or placements in specialized institutions, counsel youthful delinquents, or advise parents on their children's problems.

• • •

SCHOOL SOCIAL workers or "visiting teachers" employed by school systems also help troubled children, including those who are excessively shy, aggressive, or withdrawn; failing in school subjects for no apparent reason; hungry or ill; or truants. Workers consult with parents teachers, principals, doctors, truant officers, and other interested people.

Medical social workers employed by hospitals, clinics, health agencies, rehabilitation centers, and public welfare agencies deal directly with patients and their families, helping them meet accompanying illness, recovery, and rehabilitation. Usually these workers function as part of a medical team composed of doctors, nurses, and therapists.

PSYCHIATRIC social workers attend patients in mental hospitals or clinics. In clinical teams, composed of psychiatrists, psychologists, and other professional personnel, these workers help patients and their families to understand the nature of the illness, enlist the patients' aid in using the help available, and guide the patients in their social adjustment to their homes and communities.

Social Workers in rehabilitation services assist emotionally or physically disabled persons in adjusting to the demands of everyday living.

• • •

PROBATION AND parole officers and other correctional workers, who are hired primarily by Federal, State, county, and city governments, assist probationers, parolees, and juvenile offenders in their readjustment to society. They make investigations and submit reports to the courts. They also counsel their clients and may help them find jobs.

In addition, they frequently arrange for child placements or adoptions, provide marriage counseling, and collect court-ordered payments for support of families and children.

• • •

SOCIAL GROUP workers are employed by a multitude of agencies, including settlements and community centers, public housing developments, and resident and day centers for children.

Community organization workers plan welfare, health and recreation services for the community; coordinate existing social services; develop volunteer leadership; and assist in fund raising for community social welfare activities.

LEATHER upholstery or leather-topped tables should be cleaned only with a saddle soap or a mild soap.

Adventure whispered in the wind and Glenn Robert, age five, heard its call. "Of course," his mother said, "you can go up to Marky's to play. Be home around lunchtime," she called after him.

But lunchtime passed. Glenn's mother went out and looked up toward Mark's house. There was no sign of Glenn. She called Mark's mother, "I thought they went back to your house." Two more phone calls—no one had seen him. Could some stranger . . . ?

She pushed the thought from her mind and quickly dialed another of Glenn's kindergarten friends, this one on Hollow Road, many streets away. "Yes, he's here. Hold on, I'll get him."

Problems have a way of disappearing when you lift your phone.

Glenn's mother hung up the phone and smiled; the adventurer was on his way home.

For emergencies of any size—pleasure any day—phones are friends.
