THE LITTLE GOD

And a Separation and a Reunion.

By AGNES G. BROGAN

Philippa and Richard had been sweethearts for so long that no one could remember when the "little god" first claimed them for his own. When Richard was still a boy in high school it was Philippa who settled upon his future career as a lawyer, and, having no father to aid him in accomplishing this purpose, Richard set about making plans for its fulfillment.

Armed only with his high school diploma he obtained a position as country schoolteacher in a town which possessed the advantage of fearless fathers. And as time passed the boy managed, with the aid of a friendly old solicitor, to begin, of course of night law study. If Richard worked hard for success, so he was not single in the struggle. Philippa, who was young, yet good to look upon, might have had suitors gayer than the young lawyer, but she had loved Richard from childhood, and her affection was [illegible] in drawing [illegible]

[illegible] evening as his step sounded upon the stair she seated herself before the newly installed instrument, and as the door opened she sang a little song, the one he had liked so well. Now, Richard had left his office on that particular evening in a state of mind bordering on despair. The lawsuit in which he had labored so tirelessly, the great suit upon which he had counted so much, had been lost. There were many bills to be paid, and Richard wondered desperately as he hurried along how he was going to pay them. Then across his troubled turmoil of thought burst Philippa's merry song. As she turned on the stool to meet his look of pleased surprise her smile instantly faded.

"I—I bought the piano, Richard," she faltered, "intending to pay for it with my own money."

"Your money," he flared out contemptuously. "Then in your opinion marriage does not make two people one."

Many cruel things Richard said, led on by his blind passion of disappointment, while Philippa stood seriously thinking. She recalled her years of patient waiting, her never failing encouragement, and her heart turned within her now at his injustice.

"You should not have married me," Richard ended bitterly, "if you wished to indulge your whims."

Then Philippa closed the piano and [illegible] for it to morrow," she said. When her husband had gone Philippa began in a fashion to look her [illegible] that was accomplished [illegible]
