New history of black music is profusely illustrated.

BLACK BEAUTY, WHITE HEAT: A PICTORIAL HISTORY OF CLASSIC JAZZ, 1920-1950, by Frank Driggs and Harris Lewine (Morrow, $39.95)

So much has been written about the Jazz music that was born in New Orleans that it would seem there's no room for another book.

But Frank Driggs and Harris Lewine surely will make room for one more volume with their scholarly work. An exciting study of Jazz and the men and women who made it into what often has been called an American art form.

The authors cover a 20-year period that started with the onset of the Roaring Twenties and finished on a down beat as Jazz has going into another of its periodic declines.

More than 1,500 black and white photographs show individuals and groups, a rather commonplace way of helping to tell a story, a technique that has been used many times before in musical memorabilia. But the authors have included pages of record labels in color that will delight collectors and strike some pleasant mnemonic chords among older readers.

Among those labels are Okeh's recording of "Struttin' With Some Barbecue" by Louis Armstrong and his Hot Five, Victor's "Doctor Jazz Stomp" by Jelly Roll Morton's Red Hot Peppers, Columbia's "That's My Weakness Now" by Paul Whiteman and his Orchestra, and Vocalion's "Travelin' All Alone" by Billie Holiday and her Orchestra.

With the exception of John Hammond's foreword and Paul Bacon's introduction, most of the text consists of captions for the pictures.

Numerous reproductions of posters used to promote the appearances of Jazz stars at various emporiums gives an added touch of charm to this excursion into nostalgia.

SPORTS

O.J. Simpson signs with ABC Sports

O.J. Simpson

O.J. Simpson, one of the greatest runners in the history of the game of football, has signed a contract with ABC Sports.

After an illustrious college football career at the University of Southern California, it was ABC Sports that gave Simpson his first job — covering a track meet. Simpson still holds many fond memories from ABC, including the work he did at the 1972 summer Olympic Games in Montreal.

He's happy to return to the place where he was first hired for work other than football. "I'm looking forward to getting back there," says Simpson. "I don't know what all my duties are going to be, but 'Monday Night Football' is obviously something I want to be a part of."

Mostly remembered for his years as a member of the Buffalo Bills NFL franchise, Simpson truly was a new breed of running back. Never before had football fans seen anyone who possessed Simpson's keen instinct for running with the football. His quickness, combined with an ability to leave potential tacklers far behind, were what made Simpson the toast of snowy Buffalo.

Some of his career highlights: He was Buffalo's No. 1 draft-choice in 1969, while with the Bills, he was the AFC's leading rusher four times, and in 1973, he set an all-time NFL rushing record for having gained 3,003 yards in a single season.

That record still stands today, and it certainly won't be broken this year, in view of the shortened season caused by the NFL strike. Simpson's feelings on the recent strike are not at all vague — in his mind, the players gained little. He believes the players lost because of shabby leadership within the ranks of the players' union.

Simpson confessed that he never was a big fan of Ed Garvey, the gentleman who spoke for players throughout the long negotiating sessions with management. He later added:

"I'm glad it's over now, but I don't think that the players really gained anything. As for the future, I just hope that the one thing they consider at this point is their leadership."
