As a team the girls were finalists in their regional age group from 1967 to 1973 and regional age group champions in 1973. They were East Coast finalists, 1968 through 1973. Nationally the team placed sixth in the 1969 Junior National team meet; in 1968 they placed eighth in the Senior Nationals; and were Junior National Solo and Duet finalists in 1971.

The synchronized swimming routines which the Aqualites perform in competition around the United States are graceful and rhythmic movement in water, accompanied by music with appropriate costumes. The activity develops grace and control. The beauty of the sport has been widely recognized; it was included in the World Games, Belgrade, Yugoslavia, this year.

High court sets cross-busing plan hearings

By CHARLOTTE Moulton

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to rule this term on lower court actions which would intergrate Detroit area schools by transferring pupils between the inner city and the white suburbs. At least six other cities face similar situations.

Both U.S. District Judge Stephen J. Roth and the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals have endorsed the transfer approach which would rely heavily on busing and has created controversy in Michigan and elsewhere.

However, the Supreme Court announced it would hear oral arguments on an appeal from the lower court rulings brought by Michigan State authorities and 42 of the suburban communities. A written decision is expected before the court adjourns in June.

* * *

Indianapolis, Hartford, Conn., Wilmington, Del., Buffalo, Atlanta and Louisville are currently involved in litigation aimed at achieving greater integration by city-suburb pupil transfers.

In response to a suit initiated by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund (LDF), Roth ordered a study be made of interchanging students in Detroit schools, which are 65 per cent black, with those of more than 50 suburbs, including affluent Grosse Point and Birmingham.

The appeals court modified Roth's orders somewhat but generally upheld his finding the city and suburban schools should be integrated. He was instructed to hold hearings to work out precise student transfer plans and other details.

The Supreme Court last term handed down a 4-4 split decision on a Virginia case which presented the city suburb school issue. The ruling refused to reinstate a merger plan for Richmond and its outlying counties ordered by U.S. District Judge Robert R. Merhige but overruled by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

However, the tie vote, brought about by refusal of Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., to participate in the case, meant the high court ruling was not binding as the law of the land.

Powell, who disqualified himself because he had once served on the Richmond school board, is expected to cast the deciding vote in the Detroit case.

The court took these other actions:

Ruled 8 to 1 that employers may deny jobs to aliens despite the 1964 Civil Rights Act which bars discriminatoin on the basis of race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

Agreed to hear the claim of a white law student the University of Washington is discriminating in favor of minority groups by favoring the admission of blacks.

John Douglass prefiles tax review bill

Del. John W. Douglass, D-Balto., has prefiled a measure that will require an accounting of untallied losses through "a myriad of special tax exemptions commonly known as special tax exemptions, loopholes, exclusions, credits and write-offs.

Douglass claims that such special tax provisions, commonly known as "tax expenditures" face no accounting, no review and no control. Further, "We have no way of determining to what extent they clash, duplicate or complement directly funded programs."

Douglass says that "such tax expenditures should be examined periodically to see if they serve a high public purpose and whether or not we can justify asking taxpayers to foot the bill for these hidden expenditures."

17% of all GM employes are members of minority groups. And we don't hire people just for show.

We employ the best people we can find. And we don't have any choice in the matter, because our customers depend on us to build cars that are comfortable, convenient, dependable and safe. We can't employ people unless they can do the job.

There are over 113,000 people working at General Motors who are members of minority groups. They work in every level of our business, from the assembly line to the board room.

As far as we're concerned, there are still too few members of minority groups working as professionals, managers and technicians at GM; there are over six thousand minority employes in such jobs now. But we've been trying to remedy that situation by increasing the enrollment of minorities at the General Motors Institute, by starting a one-year pre-freshman program to fill people in on the work they may have missed in high school and by helping people through our college co-op and college-aid programs.

Our effort to hire people according to their talents isn't limited to minority groups, however. There are other people who need a greater opportunity: women, people from impoverished areas, people who speak English as a second language.

The goal at GM is to employ people justly, according to their talents. We've come a long way since 1941, when GM took its first affirmative step to bring about nondiscrimination in the work force. But most of our successes have come within the last few years.

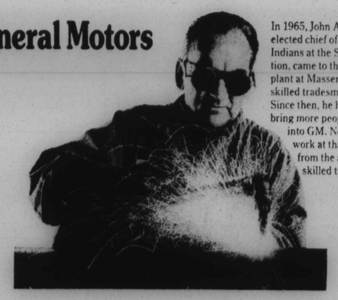
We are pleased by progress, but not satisfied. The goal at General Motors is more than equal opportunity. We intend to achieve the fullest possible utilization of men and women of all races, religions and national backgrounds at all levels of the Corporation. Nothing less will do.

GM cares about cars. GM cares about people too.

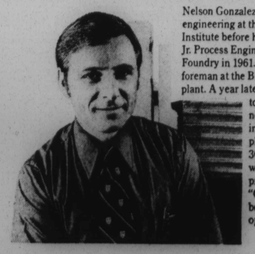
General Motors

After graduating from Wayne State University with a degree in Electrical Engineering in 1964, Proves R. Banks joined GM as a college graduate in training. He went from there to production foreman, then to general foreman, responsible for work quality, schedules and development of future management personnel. In 1971, he moved to the Chevrolet Central Office Planning Dept. He is now a Planning Administrator, coordinating long range product planning for Chevrolet conventional trucks and four-wheel drive vehicles.

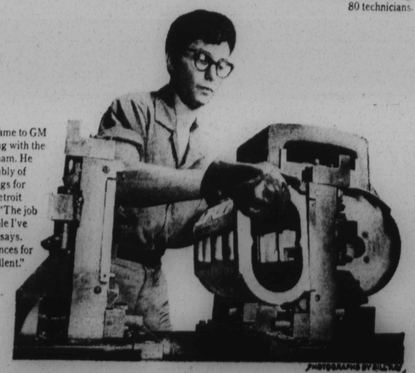
Donald L. Gothard joined GM in 1956 after graduating from Notre Dame with a B.S. in Electrical Engineering. He was part of the GM team that designed the guidance system for the Apollo command ship and lunar module. He then helped to engineer the manufacturing and testing phases, receiving commendations from NASA and MIT for his work. After that, he helped to design an operational electronically controlled car. He is now Asst. Mgr. of Engine Emissions Testing in the Advanced Product Engineering Group, supervising 80 technicians.



In 1965, John A. Cook, an elected chief of the Mohawk Indians at the St. Regis Reservation, came to the Chevrolet plant at Massena, N.Y. as a skilled tradesman, a welder. Since then, he has helped to bring more people from his tribe into GM. Now, 46 Mohawks work at that plant in jobs from the assembly line to skilled trades to foreman.



Nelson Gonzalez studied industrial engineering at the General Motors Institute before he started work as a Jr. Process Engineer at the Buick Foundry in 1961. By 1963, he was a foreman at the Buick Transmission plant. A year later, he was promoted to general foreman. He's now an assistant superintendent of the Buick plant, supervising over 300 people. He said he's worked hard for his promotions, because "GM doesn't give anybody anything but the opportunity."



Nemencio Flores came to GM in 1973 after serving with the U.S. Army in Vietnam. He works on the assembly of rotor blower housings for diesel engines at Detroit Diesel-Allison Div. "The job I have and the people I've met are alright," he says. "And I think my chances for promotion are excellent."
