Buying firewood? Don't buy moths

The Maryland Department of Agriculture is asking users of firewood to help stop the spread of gypsy moths by looking out for their egg masses on the wood they buy. The insect, which has defoliated hundreds of thousands of acres in the northeastern United States, has in recent years become a serious problem in Maryland.

Egg masses are velvety, buff colored mounds approximately 1½ inches in length that can be unwittingly transported on firewood. Dr. Douglas Kolodny - Hirsch of the MDA says that this is one of the most common ways of introducing gypsy moths into a community and once introduced, they are difficult to eradicate. He suggests a few ways for citizens to help in preventing further infestation.

If you're buying firewood, ask the seller to provide from the agriculture department in the state where the wood was cut a certificate that certifies the wood tree from gypsy moths. If the wood has been delivered and you plan to use it this winter, the eggs will be destroyed when the logs are burned.

However, before the eggs hatch in mid - April, check the remaining wood and scrape off any egg masses with a putty knife, drop the egg masses into a paper bag and burn them completely. Other methods for destroying the eggs include burying them under several inches of well packed earth or soaking them overnight in rubbing alcohol, kerosene, gasoline or bleach. Keep in mind that eggs that simply fall to the ground are not killed and may still hatch.

The Maryland Department of Agriculture, in conjunction with the US Department of Agriculture is conducting a comprehensive effort to maintain the gypsy moth at a manageable level in the state.
