CHILD WATCH:

Portrait of poverty

By Marian Wright Edelman
Portraits of Poverty

Aletha Harris worries every month whether she will be able to afford enough food for herself and her four children. Many months, she runs out. Even when she has the money for groceries, Aletha must walk the five miles from her home to the nearest store to buy them. Although she works full-time, Aletha survives only with the help of her church and her friends.

In November, Aletha and several others who are struggling with the day-to-day crisis of poverty came to Washington, DC to testify before the House of Representatives Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families. Their stories tell us, more clearly and eloquently than any report or study, what it means to be poor or near-poor in America today.

For Tweedy Williams, it meant spending two months in a shelter for the homeless with her newborn son, Bert, when they were evicted from their apartment building because the landlord had not paid the mortgage.

For Stephanie Epps, poverty means sharing her bed with her children because she does not have room to set up a crib. She and her two sons, ages three and five months, are crowded with her mother and sister in a three-room apartment. Stephanie, who is trying to finish her high school diploma, often gets up at 2 a.m. to study, since that is the only undisturbed time available to her.

For Ana Ramos, a refugee from El Salvador, it means being separated from her oldest son, who remains in El Salvador because she cannot afford to support him in this country. Ana works several days a week as a domestic but cannot work more without child care for her other children, which she cannot find or pay for. She has already lost one job because her employer would no longer allow her to bring her youngest son with her to work.

These stories give us a real picture of the human beings and personal dilemmas behind our nation's poverty statistics. When we say that 46 percent of black children and 39 percent of Hispanic children are poor today, we know that this means that millions of American families are struggling every day with some of the hardships faced by Aletha, Tweedy, Stephanie, and Ana.

Their testimony about what it means to be poor shatters popular myths about "welfare queens" and "people who will not help themselves." These mothers are trying to make their lives better for themselves and their children, against very difficult odds.

If more of our lawmakers could hear the poor speak for themselves, they might be more reluctant to continue the destructive cutbacks in programs to assist the poor that we have seen in recent years.

Without you, there's no Way.
WE PUT THE MONEY TO WORK.
