and also in payment of Government Receipts.

It would be a salutary restraint on the issues of the Bank, to make the notes receivable at the Offices in payment of debts due, whether by the State Banks or by individuals. It would have an equally good effect in checking extensive loans, and restricting the credit afforded on them; besides which it would extinguish the chief and fruitful source of difficulty and dissatisfaction existing between the State Banks and the offices, and arising from the demands of the latter for specie. Now, it is a case of common occurrence, that the State Banks are called upon for balances in specie, whilst the same Banks, and at the same period, have in their possession a larger amount in notes of the Bank, payable at the Bank, or at the principal office.

Finally, these provisions would have the effect of producing a more equal distribution of business, and of superseding that exclusive control of our monied operations now possessed and irresistably acquired by the Bank of the United States. The State Banks, and the National Bank would mutually check each other. Indeed all experience shows a constant tendency to excess in the issues and discounts of our Banking Institutions, and the experience proves that this tendency is less operative on the Bank of the United States than it is on the State Banks.

No note or bill to be issued under twenty dollars. Cheques or Drafts not to bear the similitude of current bank notes.

This restriction on the Bank will give the full circulation to the State Banks, and operate as a check on excessive issues of the latter. It will also have a beneficial effect by imparting stability to the currency. For, generally speaking, the notes of the State Banks, especially those of a smaller denomination, are confined in their circulation to their own States respectively, a demand will be created for gold and silver for the various items of small expenditure, which will at the same time serve to retain those coins in circulation. By the adoption, moreover, of a higher value for gold, and the introduction of small gold pieces, travellers may supply themselves with coin in lieu of the five dollar notes and the checques now issued by the Bank of the United States. Specie would thus become more generally distributed, and instead of transferring a portion of the treasure of the Banks to the pockets of the community, no time would be required to collect it for remittances abroad. Now, the basis of our circulating medium, from its being chiefly in the vaults of Banks at the seaports, is liable to sudden and extensive reduction, often compelling the Banks to extensive and equally sudden reductions in their discounts and circulation, whereas that portion of the specie which is distributed over the country, would, in the event of foreign demand, gradually return to replenish the Banks, and, in its transition, be productive of the same effect on the exchanges.

No bill having more than ninety days to run to be discounted either directly or indirectly, nor any loan to be made for a longer period than ninety days by the Bank or any of its Offices; and every note, bill or other obligation, to be bona fide paid as they respectively become due; nor is any renewal to be granted unless the essential interests of the Bank should require it, and then only with additional security, and by the affirmative vote of three fourths of the Board.

It should be a primary object in the administration of a Bank of the United States, so to regulate its operations as to give ample facilities to the real business of the country, without presenting any allurements to overtrading.

It is believed that the discounting by the Banks of what is termed long paper has more effect than any other measure in producing excess in the operations of merchants, and more especially of business not based on cash.

The true and legitimate purposes of Banking Institutions are fulfilled by enabling the merchant who sells his goods on credit promptly to realize the amount of sales, and thus by furnishing capital to trade upon, and thereby involving the Banks in the results of mercantile trading. The Bank of England, it is understood, discounts no paper of a longer date than sixty-five days; and it was a standing rule of the first Bank of the United States at its Offices to give a preference to paper not exceeding sixty days, when the amount offered exceeded the amount appropriated on any day for discount.

If it be objected, that the limitation of nine-ty days will turn over to the State Banks a greater share of business than they now enjoy, it will be admitted that the Bank of the United States will thereby be prevented from taking the lead in promoting operations which necessarily increase the hazards of business, and invariably result in disastrous excess and reaction.

The whole amount of profits to be divided half yearly, excepting only a reasonable sum to provide for losses; but the fund thus reserved not to exceed two millions of dollars at any time.

The Bank not to charge over the rate of six per cent. per annum on loans or discounts, nor to deal in foreign Exchange, but to have the privilege in Domestic bills of Exchange and in gold and silver bullion.

The privilege of dealing foreign exchanges requires, to say the least, a very discreet and skilful exercise, and the expediency of conferring it on any incorporated body has long been questioned. It is believed the regulation of foreign exchange had better be left to the casual operations of trade, and therefore relinquished into the hands of those whom it most concerns, and whom, it is presumed, will prove the best guardians of their own interest. In promoting the particular views of the Bank, the interests of the mercantile community must often be lost sight of; the very combinations which the Bank, with a view to its own temporary convenience, or supposed advantage, may occasionally set on foot, may as often produce injurious fluctuations in the rates of exchange, which if undisturbed by schemes purely artificial, they would not be exposed to.

Left to its natural operation, the course of exchange would serve as an indication of the relative amount of imports and exports forewarning the merchant of any accruing mass of the former, and guarding him in season against the effect of specie shipments, to make up the deficient value of property exported; but while the Bank, wielding its enormous means and credit, nearly monopolizes that branch of business, the merchant is deprived of that sure and faithful monitor, as the victim is obliged to yield his skill, his intelligence, and his interests, to those who are empowered to dispense and unwilling to entrust him with the exercise in use of either.

10. The amount of Discounts and Loans not to exceed sixty six millions of dollars; but, if from the aggregate statements of the Bank and its offices it be at any time found that this sum has been exceeded, the excess in that case to be reduced within ninety days.

11. The Stock of the Bank appropriated to any one State not to be less than $600 000, and after assigning a sufficient capital for the Bank or its office in the District of Columbia, the remainder to be appropriated among the other States according to the provisions of the first article, and the capital may be increased, on the admission of each New State into the Union, to the extent of $300,000, if desired by such new State.

12. If the capital assigned to an office be more than the amount of Bank Stock appointed to the State in which such office is located, the excess may be taxed at the same rate as State Banks in the same State.

This provision is introduced on the presumption that the Bank will pay dividends at the rate of six per cent. per annum, being 2 per cent. more than the interest on the State Stock issued in payment of the Stock of the Bank, will yield to the States an equivalent for the highest rate of tax imposed upon double the amount of the capital of the State Banks.

13 The Bank to render the same services to government in the collection and distribution of its funds, and on the same terms prescribed and provided for in the charter of the existing Bank.

14 The twenty eight millions held by the private Stockholders to be reimbursed to its proprietors in ten equal annual instalments, commencing at the end of ten years from the commencement of the new charter; and, in succession to be apportioned among the States as provided in section 1, and the direction to be changed accordingly.

By the adoption of this process the entire institution will become eventually in actual truth a Bank of the United States; and may be continued, modified or otherwise disposed of according to the legislation of Congress.

Such provisions, in the existing charter of the Bank of the United States, as have not been alluded to in these remarks, are those which, if necessary, would, it is believed, require no essential modification to render them suitable for the adoption of any new Bank.

The allusions made to the present Institution have certainly proceeded from no improper feeling, but have been unavoidable in pursuing to their results the actual operations in which it has been engaged.

While, therefore, it is admitted that many circumstances connected with the Bank of the United States, and affecting its course of policy, may have existed, of which no account has been taken in the arguments submitted with the foregoing plan, they cannot, it is thought, be arranged on the score of prejudice, whether personal or political; the most scrupulous endeavours having been made to confine the reasoning of this important subject to events known to have occurred.

At the first view it may appear that the capital allowed to the proposed Bank is excessive; but that objection will disappear upon an inspection of the rigid restrictions imposed upon its operations—the utmost limit of its discounts and loans being within the amount which has been extended to the present Bank of the United States. The entire augmentation of capital as proposed is indeed, a mere addition of STATE STOCK by way of ASSURANCE TO THE INSTITUTION, and indemnity to the PEOPLE AT LARGE for a GREAT AND VALUABLE GRANT to PARTICULAR INDIVIDUALS.
