THRILLING SKETCH.

CHARMED BY A RATTLE SNAKE.

A writer in the United States Magazine pronounces the following description of a young girl charmed by a rattlesnake, by W. Gilmore Simms, one of the most remarkable and beautiful delineations ever penned:

Before the maiden rose a little clump of bushes—bright tangled leaves flaunting wide in glossiest green, with vines trailing over them, thickly decked with blue and crimson flowers. Her eye commenced facaully with these; fastened by a starlike shining glance, a subtle ray that shot out from the circle of green leaves, seeming to be then very eye, and sending out a fluid lustre that seemed to stream over the space between and find its way into her own eyes; very piercing and beautiful was that subtle brightness of the sweetest, strongest power. And now the leaves quivered and appeared to float away only to return, and the vines waved and swung away in fantastic mazes, unfolding ever changing varieties of form and color to her gaze; but the star-like eye was ever steadfast, bright and gorgeous, gleaming in their midst, and still fastened with strange fondness upon her own.

How beautiful, with wondrous intensity did it gleam and dilate, growing larger and more lustrous with every beam it sent forth. And her own glance became intense, fixed also; but with a dreaming sense which conjured up the wildest fancies, terribly beautiful, that took her soul away from her and wrapt it about as with a spell. She would have fled, she would have flown, but she had no power to move. The will was wanting to her flight. She felt that she could have bent forward to pluck the gem like thing from the bosom of the leaf in which it seemed to grow, and which eradiated with its bright, white gleam; but ever, as she stretched forth her hand, and bent forward, she heard a rush of wings and shrill scream from the tree above her—such a scream as the mocking-bird makes when angrily it raises its dusky chest and flaps its wings furiously against its slender sides.—Such a scream seemed like a warning, and though yet dreamy, awakened to a full consciousness, it startled and forbade her effort.

More than once in her survey of the strange object had she heard that shrill note of warning, and to her mind the same vague consciousness of an evil presence.—But the star-like eye was still upon her own—a small, bright, eye, like that of a bird; now steady in its place, as observant seemingly of her, now darting forward, with the circulating leaves about it, and shooting up toward her, as if wooing her to seize. At another moment, it fled, to the vine which lay around it, it wound wind round and round, dazzling bright and beautiful, even as a torch waving hurriedly by night in the hands of some playful boy; but in all this time the glance was never taken from her own—there it grew, fixed—a very principle of light—and such a bright, a subtle burning, piercing, fascinating gleam, such as gathers in vapors above old graves and hints us as we look—shooting, darting directly into her eye, dazzling her gaze, defeating its sense of discrimination, and confusing strangely its sense of perception. She felt dizzy; for as she looked, a cloud of colors, bright, gay, various colors, floated and hung like so much drapery around the single object that had so secured her attention, and spell-bound her feet. Her limbs felt momentarily more insecure; her blood grew cold, and she seemed to feel the gradual freeze of vein by vein, throughout her person. At that moment a rustling was heard in the branches of the tree beside her, and the bird, which had repeatedly uttered a single cry above her, as it were of warning, flew away from his station with a scream more piercing than ever. The movement had the effect for which it seemed intended, of bringing back to her a portion of that consciousness she had been nearly deprived of before. She strove to move from the beautiful but terrible presence, but for a while she strove in vain. The rich, star-like glance still, invited her own, and the subtle fascination kept her bound. The mental energies, however, in the moment of her greatest trial, now gathered suddenly to her, and, and with a desperate effort, but with a feeling of most annoying uncertainty and dread, she succeeded partially in the attempt, and threw her arms backward, her hands grasping the neighboring tree, feeble, tottering, and depending upon it for that support which her own limbs almost entirely denied her. With her movement, however, came the full development of the powerful spell and dreadful mystery before her.

As her feet receded, though but a single pace, to the tree against which she now rested, the audibly articulated ring, like that of the watch when wound up with the verge broken, announced the nature of the splendid yet dangerous presence, in the form of a monster rattlesnake, now but a few feet before her, lying coiled at the bottom of a beautiful shrub, with which, to her dreaming eye, many of its own glorious hues had been assorted. She was at length conscious enough to perceive and feel her danger, but terror had deprived her of the strength necessary to fly from her dreadful enemy. There still glared the eye, beautifully bright and piercing, fixed upon her own, and seemingly to the spirit of sport, the unwieldy reptile slowly unwound himself from his coil, but only to wind himself up again into his muscular rings, his great head rising in the midst, and slowly moving, [illegible] peering into her own, the rattle slightly ringing at intervals, and giving forth that paralyzing sound which, once heard, is remembered forever. The reptile all this while being conscious of, and to sport with while seeking to excite her terrors. Now with its flat head, distended mouth, and curving neck, would it dart forth its long form to warn her—its fatal teeth, unfolding on either side of its upper jaw, seeming to threaten her with instantaneous death, while its powerful eye shot forth glances of the fatal fascination, malignantly bright, which by paralizing with a mixed form of terror and of beauty, may readily account for the spell which it possesses of binding the feet of the timid, and denying even to fear the privilege of flight. Could she have fled? She felt the necessity, but the power of her limbs was gone; and there it still lay, coiling and uncoiling, its arched neck glittering like a ring of bronzed copper, bright and lurid, and the dreadful beauty of its eyes still fastened eagerly contemplating the victim, while the pendulous rattle still rung the death-note, as if to prepare the conscious mind for the fate which is momentarily approaching the blow. Meantime, the stillness became deathlike, with all surrounding objects. The bird had gone with a scream and rush. The breeze was silent. The vines ceased to wave.—The leaves faintly quivered on their stems. The serpent once more lay still, but the eye was never turned from its victim. Its corded muscles are all in a coil. They have but to unclasp suddenly and the dreadful coils will be upon her in full length, and the fatal teeth will strike and the deadly venom which they secrete will mingle with the blood in her veins.

"The terrified damsel, her full consciousness restored, but not her strength, feels all her danger. She sees that the sport of the terrible reptile is at an end. She cannot now mistake the horrid expression of his eye. She tried to scream, but her voice died a way to a feeble gurgling in her throat. Her tongue is paralyzed—her lips sealed: once more she strives for flight, but her limbs refuse their office. She has nothing left of life, but his fearful consciousness. It is in her despair, that as a last effort she succeeds to scream, a single wild cry forced from her by this accumulated agony; she sinks down upon the grass before her enemy—her eyes however still open, and still looking upon those which are directed ever upon them. She sees him approach, now advancing, now receding; now swelling in every part with something like anger, while his neck arched beautifully like that of a wild horse under the curb, until at length, tired as it were of play, like the cat with her victim, she sees the neck growing larger, and becoming completely bowed as it to strike—the huge jaws unclosing almost directly above her; the long, tabulated fangs charged with venom, protruding from the caverns in and—and she sees no more! Insensibility came to her aid, and she lay almost lifeless under the folds of the very monster."

LIVING WITHOUT FOOD.

Mrs. Hays, of Horican, Warren County, N. Y., has not eaten anything, and not even taken a drop of water, from about the 20th of last February to the present time. She has not eaten more than a person would eat at one usual meal, while in health, since the 28th June, 1855, now about twenty-seven months. For a few times during this period, she has taken a little drink and a few tea-spoons full of berry-juice and the juice from apple sauce; but all that you can call nourishment, would not amount to one ordinary meal during the whole period.—The function of the bowels has also been entirely suspended since a year ago last June. She appears to be entirely unconscious, and is in almost continuous spasms of the most horrid character. They exceed all description, and go beyond what the most vivid imagination could represent under the head of fits, spasms, contortions, convulsions or tremors. She has had long-continued spells of raising her body up, then throwing herself back so as to strike the top of her head upon the bed—thus bringing her feet and face so near together as to form a semi-circle with her body.—Sometimes her head has been drawn back so that the line of her face would be reversed and would rest upon the pillow. Then she would straiten out again, and there would be the most forcible agitation of her whole frame—a violent quiver—a rapid spasmodic action of every nerve and muscle, with strangling and gasping for breath, like a person in the last agonies of death.—This strangling and gasping is in consequence of suspended respiration during the period her head is so forcibly drawn back. At one time she remained in that position twenty minutes. She does not usually remain in those peculiar spasms longer than from three to five minutes. During a space of three weeks they estimated that she went through with these motions at least a minute on an average. One day, on which they kept some count, there were not less than three thousand five hundred of these spasms. The least particle of food taken into the room, will produce violent heaving and retching. This is the most singular case of the kind on record.

THE POTATO, ITS HISTORY, &c.

A correspondent asks why the potato is called the Irish Potato. To answer this question it will be necessary, and perhaps not unprofitable, to give something of its history. The first potatoes ever grown in Europe were raised on Sir Walter Raleigh's estate in Ireland, the seed being taken by him from Virginia about 1692. For many years, although eaten, they were grown more as objects of curiosity than for profit. Their culture, however, seemed to increase, and, during the wars that devastated Ireland towards the end of the seventeenth century when the growing grain was destroyed by the soldiery, the potato crop served to keep the inhabitants from starvation. It could not be destroyed by fire, and, in fact, nothing but digging up the crop could destroy it, which was altogether too much like work for soldiers, and too long a job, and so the potatoes were left to the hungry people, for which they were, no doubt, very thankful.

After this the potato became very popular in Ireland, and about the year 1694 was introduced into the county of Lancanshire, England, when it gradually spread over the other adjoining counties, and through all England, but it was not until about the middle of the seventeenth century that the Scotch gave it a trial. Previous to this date, in England potatoes were grown principally in vegetable gardens; and occupied no prominent place in field culture. During the latter end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century the potato increased in popularity, and there was a consequent increase in its culture.—But, even up to 1812, the limited extent of of the crop may be judged from the fact that during that year, when breadstuffs were extremely dear and scarce, the British Parliament were urged by agricultural and political economists and the press to recommend, or pass some law requiring, that every farmer should grow one acre of potatoes for every hundred acres occupied.

What the original variety first taken from Virginia was, or whether more than one variety, is not known, and it was not until the year 1800 that we find so much said of different sorts. At that time Donaldson, in his Modern Agriculture, enumerated thirty-seven varieties as being cultivated in England. After it had been known and cultivated for two hundred years it was thought necessary by some of the wisest and best men to encourage or enforce its growth by parliamentary action. In twenty years after this question was agitated, so popular had it become and so general its use, that no root could compare with it, either in the quantity raised or in the esteem in which it was held by the people.—The fact, therefore, that a plant gains but slowly in popular favor is no certain evidence that it is not valuable, and we should be careful how we cry out "humbug" at everything new because of apparent failure at first. Some of the new plants lately introducee may ultimately effect as great a moral, social and political revolution in this country as did the potato in Europe.

If the Chinese sugar cane shall enable the farmers of the North to manufacture sugar and molasses so as to supply our markets at a cheap rate, who can calculate the mighty moral and social change that will be peacefully effected by it, compared with which the greatest political revolution will sink into insignificance. We may learn, also, the folly of growing one crop so exclusively as to make its success or failure a matter of such serious importance—almost a question of life and death, instead of a mere matter of profit or loss for a season. We have always urged our farmers to grow a diversity of crops, even where one or two seemed for a time to be the most profitable, and the failure of the wheat crop in the Genesee Valley has proved the wisdom of the advice.

The potato with us is an important crop. It is found every day of the year upon the tables of the rich and poor, and is at once a luxury and necessity. In no part of the country is it grown so extensively, we think, as around Rochester. Immense quantities are shipped every year to New York, as far west as Chicago, and most of the large cities of Canada West. No crop (excepting fruit) pays as well. In 1854 they averaged one dollar per bushel; in 1855, fifty cents; in 1856, one dollar; and at the present time are selling at from three to four shillings. Those who grow largely for shipping, generally keep their crop over until spring, when the demand is greater and the price higher than in the fall. For keeping potatoes nothing equals a good root cellar, and some of our potato farmers have very fine ones. This is much better and more economical than burying in the ground.

For several years the potato-rot has not been very serious, though every wet summer the crop is more or less injured. In 1855 the summer crop was very wet, and probably full one third of the potatoes were destroyed. In 1856 we had a dry season, and saw not the slightest sign of rot. The present summer has been wet, and rather cold and backward, and we have heard much complaint of this disease, and observed unmistakable signs of mischief on the vines. We have seen several lots dug on high, sandy ground, and not two per cent. were affected. On heavy, moist land, the evil is much more serious. Indeed, we would not try to grow potatoes on a heavy soil. As one hundred or one hundred and fifty bushels is not a large crop, our readers will have no difficulty in figuring up a good profit from growing potatoes at the prices we have named, even though the crop should be injured somewhat in wet seasons, as during the past five years.—Rural New Yorker.

WINE AT TWO MILLIONS A BOTTLE

We had almost believed that the types had annexed a few straggling figures, but on perusing the entire article which we find in a late number of the Courrier des Etats Unis, under the above caption, we find it is "a fixed fact" that there is such a costly beverage in the world as wine at $2,000,000 a bottle, and, what is better, that there is "more of the same sort left." The said article discourseth somewhat in this wise: Among the rare luxuries of rich Germany, which graces the table of the King of Wurtemberg, on the occasion of the meeting of his two imperial guests, one might see a figuring conspicuously the celebrated wine of Rosenwein, of which the free city of Bremen is so justly proud. The burgomasters alone of this city are privileged to appropriate a few bottles for private use, or to present a sovereign or a reigning prince. The history of this wine, which is worth today 11,000,000 francs—there is no typographical mistake here—possesses all the marvelousness of a legend, and is briefly as follows: The cellar of Bremen is the most ancient of all the cellars in Germany. It is situated under the Hotel de Ville. One of its apartments, called the rose, from a bas-relief in bronze representing roses, and serving the double purpose of an ornament and guide, contains the famous wine of Rosenwein, deposited there nearly two centuries and a half. In 1624 there were placed in this cellar six large cases of Rhenish wine, called Johannisberger, (Schloss-Johannisberg, the ancient abbey now belonging to the family of Metternich) and the same number of cases named Hocheimer.—The adjoining part of the cellar also stores wines of the same description, now less costly, although not so old by a few years. They were contained in twelve large cases each one of which bore the name of one of the twelve Apostles; and the wine of Judas, despite the reprobation attached to its name, is to this day more highly esteemed than all the others. In other parts of the cellar are to be found different wines of later years. Whenever a bottle of the Rosenwein is taken out it is replaced by the wine of the twelve Apostles—the latter by a younger wine, and so on with the others, so that, unlike the vessel of the Danaides, the sacred cases are never empty.

Now for the price: One large case of the wine, containing 5 oxhoft of 204 bottles, cost 500 rix dollars in 1624. Including the expenses of keeping up the cellar, and of the contributions, interest of the amounts, and interests upon interests, an oxhoft cost at the present time 555,557,640 rix dollars, and consequently a bottle is worth 2,723,812 rix dollars; a glass, or the eighth part of a bottle, is worth 340,476 rix dollars—(about 1,361,904 francs, or $272,580; or at the rate of 540 rix dollars, or 1362 francs, $272 per drop.) A burgomaster of Bremen is privileged to have one bottle whenever he entertains a distinguished guest who enjoys a German or European reputation. During the French occupation some of the generals of the Empire were allowed a considerable quantity of this precious liquor. Hence the Bremenese believe that their city paid a larger contribution to France than all the other cities of Germany united.—Washington Union.

THE LOAF.

Once upon a time, during a famine, a rich man invited twenty of the poorer children in the town to his house, and said to them:

"In this basket there is a loaf of bread for each of you: take it, and come back every day at this hour till God sends us better times."

The children pounced upon the basket, wrangled and fought for the bread, and each wished to get the largest loaf; and at last went away, without even thanking him.

Franceska alone, a poor but neatly dressed little girl, stood modestly apart, took the smallest loaf which was left in the basket, gratefully kissed the gentlemanly hand and then went home in a quiet and becoming manner.

On the following day the children were equally ill behaved, and poor Franceska this time received a loaf which was scarcely half the size of the others. But when she came home, and when her sick mother cut the loaf, there fell out of it quite a number of bright silver pieces.

The mother was alarmed and said, 'take back the money this instant, for it has no doubt got into the bread through some mistake.'

Franceska carried it back, but the benevolent gentleman declined to receive it.

"No, no," said he, "it was no mistake.—I had the money baked in the smallest loaf simply as a reward for you, my child.—Always continue thus contented, peaceable, and unassuming. The person who prefers to remain contented with the smallest loaf rather than quarrel for the large one, will find blessings in this course of action still more valuable than the money which was baked in your loaf."

"Better a poor but peaceful life,
Than wealth and furlane bought with strife."

KANSAS.—The returns of the election in Kansas are still incomplete, and the character of the newly-elected Legislature is involved in doubt. Advices from Lawrence to the 15th, claim a Free State majority in both branches, but it is added that in many precints the judges are throwing out votes upon the ground of informality. A letter from Quindaro gives the Free-State men nine and the others four of the Councilmen, and says the House of Representatives will contain twenty-two Free-State men, and thirteen Pro-Slavery men, with four districts to hear from. Parrott's majority as Delegate is over 5,000. In view of this result, the Chicago Times, which is regarded as the special organ of Senator Douglas, asserts that Kansas must be a free State, and that the sooner the evident wish of the people is allowed to prevail in the matter, the better.
