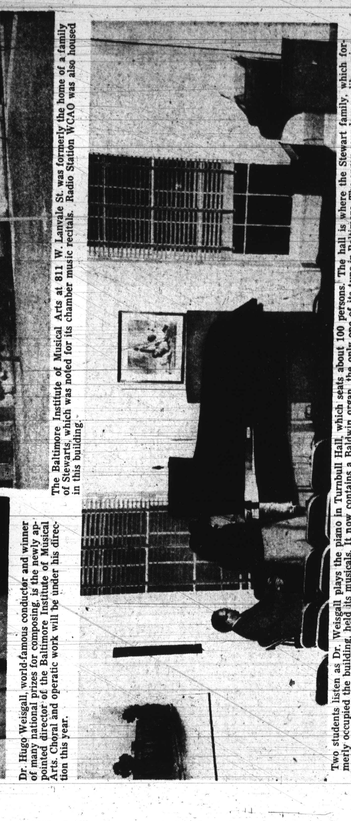
Musical Arts Institute

Opening its sixth academic year this week, the Baltimore Institute of Musical Arts is offering a full curriculum for music students and an opportunity for public participation in choral, operatic and orchestral work. The newly appointed director, Hugo Weisgall, and assistant, Hans F. Flexner, both well-nationally experienced, have plans for making the school a center of musical activity for students and over 300 others have registered for courses in theory, chorus, including piano, composition and organ. The school is fully an annex suitable for chorus, orchestra, or opera rehearsals. An interracial chorus, open to the public, will be launched this year to present first class works with nationally known soloists.

Dr. Hugo Weisgall, world-famous conductor and winner of many national prizes for composing, is the newly appointed director of the Baltimore Institute of Musical Arts. Choral and operatic work will be under his direction this year.



The Baltimore Institute of Musical Arts at 811 W. Lanvale St. was formerly the home of a family which was noted for its chamber music recitals. Radio Station WCAO was also housed in this building.

Two students listen as Dr. Weisgall plays the piano in Turnbull Hall, which seats about 100 persons. The hall is where the Stewart family, which formerly lived in the house, gave musicals. It now contains a Baldwin organ, the only one of its type in Baltimore. The organ sounds more like a pipe organ than any other electric organ.

Dr. Weisgall is playing a Baldwin piano which was formerly used by Jose Iturbi for three years. The piano, one of three in Baltimore, is one of four grand pianos in the school.

Two students, Sandra Graham, left, and Miss Elaine Wallace, play a two-piano practice rooms provided with one or two pianos at the Musical Arts Institute.

The Chimes in the Chapel Are Ringing

At Sharp Street Methodist Church

By LOUISE K. HINES

THE "sweetest music ever toiled" is an apt description of the electric chimes recently heard daily at 6:30 p.m. from historic Sharp Street Methodist Church, located at Dolphin and Etting Sts.

Dedicated by the late Bishop W. A. C. Hartzell, the chimes were first heard on Sunday at the Washington Annual Conference session at Sharp Street Church, the chimes ring out their lovely melodies on the hour, the quarter hour, the 3-quarter hour, and the hour. Fraught with cares and worries of the day, the chimes bring to the ears of the McCollin Homes to sing the familiar hymns each evening. The chimes are also heard at the Home at Provident Hospital and at the Home for Aged and Infirm of the N. M. Carroll Home.

Electrical Operation

Programs of hymns and organ music are played on a keyboard in the vestibule of the church. Music is played from records, through an electrical control cabinet in the pastor's study of the church, through a 50-watt amplifier, through the chimes. The system is operated by a switch in the bell music.

The mechanism of the chimes is located in the belfry of the church. The chimes are hung in the belfry of the church. The chimes are hung in the belfry of the church. The chimes are hung
