Hearings on 'After Hours' Spots Proposed by Young

Pressure Put on Commissioner by Licensed Tavern Owners to 'Crack Down' on Dawneries

WASHINGTON

The drive initiated by operators of cafes and clubs, who pay high fees for legitimate liquor licenses, to have the Police Department "crack down" on unlicensed "after hours" spots bore fruit this week.

This was indicated, Monday, when Commissioner J. Russell Young announced that public hearings soon would be held on the question of new legislation to end after-hours drinking in the District of Columbia.

Hearing Felt Necessary

Said Commissioner Young, "The after hours club situation has become a bad situation and we want to correct it or wipe it out if necessary. So far," he added, "we have formed no conclusions.

"First we want to hear from the clubs, the public, and the legitimate licensed dispensers. Then, if we find that new legislation is the only answer, we'll propose it."

It has been reported that Commissioners Young and Guy Mason have expressed a preference for a type of legislation patterned after the Missouri law, which prohibits the sale of setups and consumption of liquor between 1:30 a.m. which is the regular closing time for public liquor dispensers, and 6 a.m.

Liquor Sales Reported

All night drinking has been possible because after hours clubs, which pay only a $2 occupancy fee, allow their "members" to bring their own beverages. They leave their bottles at the club for convenience and the club is supposed to sell only setups.

However, police have charged after a number raids in both the uptown and downtown areas that the clubs were not restricted to members and they sell liquor to those who did not have their own bottles.

Legitimate dispensers have been protesting about this practice because they have to pay high fees and are closely regulated by the Alcoholic Beverage Commission.

Dispensers Behind Action

The commissioners reported that they recognize that many people work while others sleep, such as cab drivers, printers, entertainers, newspapermen, motion picture projectionists and many others.

What provisions can be made for such people will be determined at the hearings.

Clerics Back Davis for Battalion Chief

PHILADELPHIA

The Evening Baptist Ministers Conference of Philadelphia voted, Monday night, to carry the fight for a colored battalion chief in the Fire Department directly to Mayor Samuel and William F. Meade, chairman of the Republican City Committee.

The group voted to throw its support behind Capt. James Davis, head of Engine Company No. 11, at 10th and South Sts., after hearing how the veteran fireman had been given a rating of 100 in an examination by his superior, only to have it changed at City Hall.

Davis, a member of the Fire Bureau for 31 years, took the examination for battalion chief in August of last year.

Mark Reduced to 84

His immediate superior, Battalion Chief George E. Duffy, gave him a mark of 100 for seniority and service. But ministers were told, but in the final gradings that section of the examination showed only 84.04.

"We want to know," said the Rev. Bertram Barton, chairman of the conference's civic committee, "how Captain Davis lost 16 points between Third and Delancey St. and City Hall?"

Captain Davis, in a brief talk to conference members at Baptist Council Headquarters, said he had found out it was "all right to command members of your own group, but when it comes to commanding both racial groups, that's a different story."

CAPT. JAMES DAVIS

Associate Supports Davis

Accompanying Captain Davis to the meeting was Capt. William Mann, white, who told the conference his colored colleague was qualified in every respect for promotion to battalion chief.

"I know Captain Davis is competent," Mann said, "because I have worked with him for many years."

"Don't let them push you around at City Hall," he added, "and you'll get what you want. Just park on the second floor (Director of Public Safety's office) and sit there until you are heard and action is taken."

Company's Record Excellent

It was pointed out that Captain Davis, whose company is colored, had 22 recommendations and commendations, including some from the mayor, for the work of his unit.

His company also received high praise from the Fire Underwriters of America.

The Rev. W. V. Cholmondeley, president of the conference, declared that his organization would "see this thing all the way through to the end."

"We are not going to let this drop," the Rev. Mr. Cholmondeley said, "we're going to get action or take action ourselves in November at the elections."

A Tribute to the Late WILLIAM J. YORKMAN

In the passing of Mr. William J. Yorkman, Centennial Methodist Church loses one of its oldest members—a man who worshipped at our first church and who marched from the old Dallas Street Church to our new church, built and occupied in November, 1916 at the corner of Bank and Caroline Streets and known as Centennial M.E. Church.

Mr. Yorkman's life, with that of his fore-bears, is intricately woven into the early history of this church and congregation. The record of the church shows that his grandmother sang on the church choir about a century ago.

The deceased often told the history committee of the church that he partook of the first Holy Communion offered in the old church at Dallas and Bank Streets and we of this generation recall that he also partook of the first Holy Communion offered in the New Centennial edifice on East Monument Street in September, 1941.

As a layman, Mr. Yorkman served his church as Steward, Steward and Trustee. We recall that he believed in the capabilities of young people and on one occasion was the first Trustee, who advocated in 1907, that a young man of twenty-one years of age, should be superintendent of the Sunday school.

For his many deeds of kindness and a life of genuine service to his church and congregation, all departments of Centennial Methodist Church join to solid chalank in salute to him.

The Lord taketh and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord.

Respectfully submitted

Only The AFRO Has All Three

Lady Policeman

By RUFUS WELLS

Mrs. Carolyn M. Robinson, Northeastern district policewoman now entering her fifth year of the force, often becomes so engrossed in her work she doesn't find time to eat.

Her lunch hour was long overdue. There still didn't seem to be time to eat. Her lunch bag containing her lunch as she had prepared it was still in her office at 2:35 p.m. Tuesday for an interview.

Although lunch hour was long overdue, there still didn't seem to be time to eat. Everywhere she went, including a truant officer were waiting in the outer office to see her.

Mrs. Robinson, who is not always as busy as this but it never seems to be anything but interesting tasks like arresting a six-foot burglary suspect and locating a missing Negro boy.

The policewoman handles every thing from juvenile delinquency, loitering to the most vicious crimes on the books. Her work is varied and rewarding.

Her duties involve the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Harris, she was born in Mt. Airy, Md. and was graduated from Morgan State College in 1936.

She taught school in Baltimore County and served as matron at the Maryland Training School for Girls, before being appointed to the force in October, 1942.

Mrs. Robinson, the first two years in the department in the Eastern district, then in the Northwestern district where she worked with Mrs. Violet B. Wayne, Baltimore's first Negro policewoman.

In November, 1944, she was transferred to the Northeastern district assigned to the Northeastern district. Her duties include juvenile and female delinquency then rampant in that section.

Unlike some of the other colored policewomen, she is a specialist, having taken special courses in sociology and law enforcement. And she has practical experience in working with delinquent youth.

The average day for this feminine law enforcement officer begins in the office at 8 a.m. when she spends an hour interviewing persons seeking advice or assistance to court (either juvenile or female) or just plain "shooting the breeze" ventilated. Often she is called from the court of neglected children to the courtroom.

The afternoon is spent interviewing persons in connection with court or in making investigations for the Department of Public Welfare for hardship cases. The trunk of the car she drives is usually filled with food, clothing and toys for needy children, without the red tape usually accompanies such donations.

Her pocketbook contains a petty cash fund to provide food and clothing for persons in extreme need. Her car also contains a delivery in motion for more sustaining support for the family or individual in need.

This may be to find the delinquent father, who has left home, or to force him to support his family. Or it may be to provide relief from the Department of Public Welfare.

Around Christmas time the policewoman takes on the role of Santa Claus. Last year she visited Santa Claus and delivered a folding bed to a family of eight who had to sleep on the floor.

The year before that she worked with the Department of Public Welfare in placing a newly born abandoned baby adopted before Christmas.

In addition to the large Christmas tree at the station house, there are several trees in the district at this time. Children come from far and near to see the Santa Claus they have presented for them.

Mrs. Robinson has evidence of the good she has accomplished, though she is reluctant to talk of it. Letters of thanks have been tendered by Gov. Lane and Commissioner A. Kinson for successful completion of an assignment involving a Negro youth who was kidnapped case the same year which drew favorable comment in the Baltimore Sun and other metropolitan newspapers.

She lives with her husband Carroll N. Robinson and her son of a previous marriage, Charles Fletcher, 18, a Morgan College freshman, at 1118 W. Lafayette Ave.

Pictured at her desk is Mrs. Carolyn M. Robinson, Northeastern district policewoman, who is referred to as "the lady in blue." She is assigned to the Northeastern Station, and her beat includes the thickly populated East Baltimore area, which is her stamping ground and her heart. Mrs. Robinson always finds time to help and advise persons with problems.
