Probe Called Nuisance by Pennsylvania Avenue

The current numbers probe being conducted by the grand jury is generally thought to be a nuisance and "unfair" by habitues of Pennsylvania Ave.

Detective Lloyd Johnson, summoned to testify before the grand jury, was sitting in a luncheonette at Pennsylvania Ave. and Mosher St., reading his horoscope in the daily paper.

That particular day it read: "Some restraint felt? It may well serve to keep you on right path and producing results from intelligent effort."

A local attorney, also summoned, was sitting in the same luncheonette. He attacked the unfairness of the grand jury's policy of calling witnesses.

He admitted, however, his business had been good of late since he received the publicity of having to testify. The attorney discounts this added business, saying: "I wouldn't go through that again for a million dollars."

A character caught in that Furnace Branch raid, in which Kenny Bass was also charged, was standing in front of a Pennsylvania Avenue bar, two days later, loudly boasting the fact that he hadn't worked in years.

The fellow pointed to a big Cadillac sitting at the curb and said: "See that? When I get tired of that I'll buy another one."

Capt. Emerson mentions elsewhere in this paper, that such talk is one of the reasons for raids are so successful among gaming people.

A local school teacher and former AFRO employee, warmly praised the edition which published facts about white persons being active in the lottery racket. About seven "sporting figures" were given. Only one judge approved the edition.

A white Pennsylvania Ave. tavern owner jumping to "Little" Willie Adams's defense loudly praised him and Mrs. Adams as good citizens.

He repeatedly said he had no ulterior motive either.

Much of the talk along the "Avenue" concerns the probe. Many people are wondering whether pressure is being put on the downtown vice lords too late.

They agree that with the AFRO interested, colored people involved will get a fair shake, but one fellow said: "I wondered why you all hadn't done this long ago!"

Meanwhile, many of the people called by the grand jury are "sweating it out," hoping that when the grand jury's term expires, they won't be indicted.

Even though they may not be indicted, many of them will still have an unfair smear, on their reputation.

Hearing Set on Ranch House for Dr. Fred Adams

Two lots, 2505-7 Overland Avenue Morgan Park, carried a poster indicating a hearing before the Zoning Board next week.

The posted lots are the property of Dr. Frederick Adams, East Baltimore physician. Plans, drawn by architect A. H. Carrigan and Co., call for a one - story stone ranch house containing two bedrooms, den, living room and bath with a "Breeze Way" between the house and garage. The basement is to house a club cellar, gas fired boiler, and knotty pine club room and laundry.

Mr. Greenfield of the Zoning Board told the AFRO that the Adams' place involves two violations.

1. City regulations in E zones require a back yard depth of 28 feet. Dr. Adams' back yard is 14 feet.

The garage could be separated from the house and front on the back street. In this case, there would be no violation. Joining the house to the garage and leaving only 14 feet of yard creates the violation.

2. Dr. Adams' house is set back 30 feet from the lot line. Since the majority of houses in the area are set back more than that, Dr. Adams' house should conform, it is said.

Mr. Greenfield said the board would ordinarily regard these violations as technical and approve them.

Sometimes it approves them, he said, whether the other residents protest or not.

Minister Nabbed After Gun Sale

Thursday morning found still another minister in Northwestern Police Court.

The Rev. Elliott Cryor, 1500 E. block of Moreland Ave., and pastor of a church at Mount St. and Riggs Ave., was charged with selling a gun to Russell Carrington, 19, 1400 block W. Lanvale St.

The Rev. Mr. Cryor told Magistrate John Berry he had no idea Carrington was a minor, and sold the gun only after the youth claimed he needed it for protection, after his house was burgularized.

After Rev. Cryor sold the gun to Carrington, the lad returned and demanded his money back. The gun, a foreign make, was no good because he couldn't find shells for it.

To pacify the youth, the Rev. Mr. Cryor said, he gave him another gun, a .32 cal. revolver. Carrington took this gun home and fired it three times at a tin can in his yard.

Magistrate Berry gave the minister a suspended sentence of $50 and costs.

2. Charges as Student

Carrington, a NYU student, was charged with firing the gun within the city limits, and purchasing the gun. Magistrate Berry suspended sentence on the purchase charge, but imposed a $5 fine for firing the gun.

There's Money to Be Made In Alaska

Colored Population Soars as GI's Stationed There During War Return to Make a Good Living.

By HERBERT M. PRISOY

KETCHIKAR, Alaska — Until little over 10 years ago, it was believed and steadfastly maintained that colored people, by reason of skin pigmentation are best adapted for life in a warm climate.

Matthew Henson, Artic explorer was considered the exception to the rule when he made the dash to the North Pole with Commander Perry in 1906.

World War II, by reason of stress and compulsion made the Army move to disprove that the "colored people must stay south" theory is a fallacy, when the army decided to send 3,000 colored soldiers to the Arctic to help build the Alaska Highway.

Protests poured into Washington, D.C., by the thousands over the decision to send colored soldiers from Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia and Mississippi northward. "They'll all freeze to death." "It's just a scheme to kill all colored people," "It's undemocratic."

These protests had no effect what ever upon Washington because the Japs were knocking at our back doors. More colored soldiers were hustled north. Some did freeze to death, mostly by reason of indiscretion, disobeying instructions and a few, it is said, to be defied on Faith, if not above.

The War ended and the Arctic Boys returned home to the southland. Some of them didn't stay around long, but made a straight get away back North, and now instead of the 126 colored persons reported by 1940 U.S. Census as residents of all Alaska, we have large numbers scattered throughout the territory. I don't know how many, but they do exceed the native population in many areas. No definite figures will be available until a report is made on the 1950 census. And this won't be too accurate because more and more are coming in daily.

They come into the territory by the fastest means, the airplane.

When I refer to colored people in Alaska, I'm referring to civilian population only. In the military, there are lots and lots of them, male and female.

Colored residents, in largest numbers are found in Anchorage and Fairbanks, the hubs of activities because of the location here of important military installations.

In Fairbanks, an interior city and one of the hottest in the summer and coldest in the winer, most of the colored people are hired. I have searched the town over and have failed to find a legitimate business operation conducted by them within the town limits. Beyond the border one finds speakeasies flourishing tonight and padlocked tommorrow by the police, with the operators vacationing in the city jail.

When you ride the Fairbank's buses you'll run into bus operator Earl Wheat of Oakland, California. He's the "trimmiest" driver working the buses of the Alaska Coach-ways. He formerly drove buses of the Pacific Greyhound out of Oakland.

Said he, "I believe there are always better opportunities for every body. Alaska appealed to me. So I drove here over the Alaska highway. I placed my record before the officials of the Alaska Coachways and they gave me a trial. That was nine months ago." Mr. Wheat plans to remain in the territory until he saves enough to purchase a home in California.

Holding forth on the Campus of the University of Alaska are a Mrs. King, and Mr. Earl Shannon. Mrs. King operates the laundry plant and Mr. Shannon is her assistant. Mrs. King brought to Alaska a wide experience in commercial laundry operations. The set - up here clicks and gives excellent service and satisfaction. Shannon has been in Fairbanks 7 years.

This is his story: "I served here during the war. I went home. One day I decided to drive to Kansas City, Mo. When I got there, I kept going and this kept up from city to city until I reached Edmonton, Canada.

"Well, I knew about the Alcan Highway and decided to try it. When I got as far as I could go, I found myself in Fairbanks. So here I am and most likely I'll stay here. I expect to open up a business of my own when I make enough 'money.'"

Allie Murphy, an Alabama boy, is her working to accumulate sufficient funds to attend the University of Alaska at Fairbanks this winter. He is serving as custodian of the Piles on Buildings on the University Campus. Allie has an excellent voice which is being trained by one of the University's instructors.

Housing facilities are inadequate and expensive for many have come to Fairbanks, white as well as colored. However, colored residents seem to seek for the best land or flat areas and concentrate in a ghetto like aggregation. This might be poorly expressed, but here is what I mean. Beyond the ghetto, outside the Fairbanks town is a colored trailer camp. They have as many trailers as it is possible to squeeze on the limited area. There's plenty of space around to spread out. Trailers are lined up so that you can step from one into another. There is no sanitation. But it will only take a little muscle energy to build a second outhouse and thereby eliminate the morning waiting list.
