Cost, tension postpone filming of 'Nat Turner'

BOYKINS, Va. (UPI) — A major motion picture studio has postponed filming the picture "Nat Turner" here, but reports of the reasons behind the decision differ.

Officials for 20th Century Fix Film Corp. claim high costs are causing the delay. Lawyer Gilbert W. Fran-Frances, local representative for the company, said production estimates now stand at $2 million than the original $4.5 million budgeted.

The film would be based on the book by William Styron, "The Confessions of Nat Turner." It is a story about a slave revolt led by Turner in 1831 in this rural section of Tidewater Virginia.

• • •

Filming was to have begun late this month in the area.

Styron gave a different version of why the film was sidetracked. He said comments apparently "wortests from militant elements apparently "worried" the film executives.

He said the film had racial problems from the outset, and that a boycott was threatened at one time.

Styron said producer David Wolper agreed to change the title from that of the book to just "Nat Turner" and also alter the credit line of Styron by adding "with additional source material."

The author further stated, in an interview with the Norfolk, Virginian-Pilot from his home in Roxbury, Conn., that a historian here, Gilbert Francis, claimed the book was not historically accurate and he was willing to be an adviser.

"I'm glad they've postponed the film," he said. "Quite possibly, they'll make a better film on the next go-round."
