PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY

Violence feared when school opens to all

By PAUL EVANS

In an effort to avert possible violence when Prince Georges County schools desegregate August 31, the Maryland Commission on Human Relations voted at its Tuesday meeting to direct its executive director "to express to the appropriate state and federal officials a lack of confidence in the police of Prince Georges County to protect the lives of citizens in the county."

Commission action came after lengthy discussion of the issue of police-community relations in the Washington suburban county.

The Prince Georges County police have long been under study by the Commission for alleged mistreatment "of certain disadvantaged peoples" in that subdivision.

During the latter part of 1969, a black man was killed at the hands of a Prince Georges white policeman, that death brought to focus a very serious problem which had been brewing between the citizens of the county and the county police and administrators.

The governor's office and the Human Relations Commission became involved in the county after a citizens group brought the incident to the attention of these bodies.

Citizens also had other complaints to register with the Human Relations Commission concerning alleged illegal activities of the police department in dealing with the black population of the country.

The Commission attempted to set up a meeting with county officials in an effort to head off what could have become a Tuesday meeting.

serious problem, according However the Commission's attempts were unsuccessful.

During the month of May, a formal request was sent to County Commissioner Francis Aluisi, requesting him to set up a meeting involving Prince George's County officials and members of the state commission.

At that time, the Prince the Prince George Co. Human Relations Commission become involved in the controversy. A meeting was finally held on July 1.

After persuasion by the Prince Georges Human Relations Commission, the Commissioners agreed to the following measures:

(1). The administrative offices study the County Human Relations Commission, with the thought of strengthening the commission's powers to meet the ever changing demands placed on the commission and report back as soon as possible.

(2). Establish a Task Force to review techniques now in use in other jurisdictions in relationship to the Civilian Review Board, and to make recommendations to the Board on the advisability of establishing such a Board.

(3). Request that the Justice Department use "Dood office" to evaluate procedures and techniques being used by the Police Department and to make recommendations that would strengthen the Police Department, particularly in relation to minority groups. Ignore" certain basic recommendations made in an investigation by the International Police Chiefs in 1967 on police-community relations in the county.

The Maryland Commission believes however, that County officials continue to ignor "certain basic recomendations made in an investigation by the International Police Chiefs in 1967 on police-community relations in the county.

The State Commission believes further: "The action that has been taken by the County Commissioner of Prince George's County are not of the type that would occasion any immediate change in the relationship between the citizens of Prince George's County who are registering complaints and the County Police Department."

It concludes: "either the Prince George's County Commissioners are not aware of the seriousness of the problem, or in the alternative, are unwilling to deal realistically with the serious problem that faces them."

The Commission had originally scheduled hearings on the serious police-community relations problem for August 13 and 14. But as a result of hearing that violence may be possible on August 31, the commission voted Tuesday to postpone public hearings until September 13 and 14.

Members of the County Human Relations Commission felt that holding hearings on the police before the orderly desegregation process might in some way interfere with that process.

Although members of the State Commission were not certain as to how holding hearings could affect the orderly desegregation of the county schools they yielded to the county Human Relations Commission.

Thus the state had, according to Robert Spencer, chairman of the Black Concerned Citizens of Prince George's County, "spoken its promise to the county and to him" by not holding August hearings.

In statements before the Commission earlier Mr. Spencer explained that relations betwenn the police and citizens in the county were "extremely serious" and that he begged the Commission" to come as soon as possible."

Wehn the Commission had voted to delay hearings, Mr. Spencer said, "You have insulted me and the citizens of my county. I ask you to withdraw all of your staff personnel. We will do the job ourselves, thank you."

Sampson Green, commission member, who had voted against delaying hearings, said: "I fear that the Commission had made one of its first blunders."

Mr. Green and William E. Rose, another member, had argued in favor of August hearings as promised to give the citizens "some confidence that we were interested in their problems and conditions."
