Discrimination Fighter

William Alfred Carroll Hughes Jr., attorney, son of the late Methodist Bishop W. A. C. Hughes Sr., began practicing law in 1931 when he was 25 years old, a Boston University Law School graduate.

At 30, he lent his talent to the cause of civil rights as a volunteer NAACP attorney, a member of the organization's Legal Redress Committee.

Through the years, he has burned midnight oil using spare time from his office to win more than 30 NAACP cases. Many of his cases set precedents, reversing old rulings or establishing new ones.

Today, at 56, he is dean of the corps of attorneys who appear before the courts of the land to plead for equal justice under the law.

Mindful of these 26 years of courageous, unselfish service to the cause of freedom, the AFRO adds his name to its Honor Roll.

HOWEVER, the specific citation of W. A. C. Hughes Jr., comes for a noteworthy legal determination in 1961.

It was his astute legal opinion which showed that under the law the State Department of Mental Hygiene needed no legislative enactment nor judicial order to proceed with the immediate desegregation of state mental hospitals. All Maryland mental institutions are now required to integrate.

Both the NAACP and citizens of Maryland were spared untold expense which would have been involved in court tests.

Modest, easy going, the native born Marylander, father of three daughters, has never sought recognition nor prominence for himself.

In 31 years, he has seen his other law partners, Thurgood Marshall, Donald Murray, John Hargrove, Dave Mason, James McAllister, James Bundy, Calvin Douglass, go on to judgeships and other positions on higher ground.

The AFRO feels W. A. C. Hughes Jr. has met all the requirements — service to the community and his neighbors without thought of personal gain.
