CHILD CARE

Need proper lighting for good home work

Modern classrooms are scientifically designed to promote and encourage learning, but the home atmosphere sometimes works against it.

A key element for a proper learning environment is a high level of well-balanced and evenly distributed lighting.

PROPER LIGHTING should enable a student to see quickly, accurately and comfortably with a minimum of distractions. Many students return home from well lighted schools to the contrast of poorly lighted home study areas.

Parents sometimes forget that seeing is work that consumes energy. If lights are inadequate or improper for the job, speed decreases, accuracy suffers and the job becomes increasingly uncomfortable.

• • •

PROPER STUDY lighting is that which places 150 to 200 watts of light on the work surface in a manner that eliminates or minimizes glare, shadows or high contrasts of brightness.

This can best be achieved by a pair of adjustable wall or ceiling fixtures that you can find at a lighting fixture showroom.

SUCH LIGHTING also makes more work space available by eliminating desk clutter. Fixtures should be positioned so that bulb sockets are 30 inches apart. Shade buttons should be 15 inches above the desk surface.

A single, long light source across the desk is also effective.

To provide the student with best possible light conditions:

TURN ON other lights in the room to reduce shadows and contrasts in the child's field of vision. The whole room should be well-lighted with a greater concentration at the work area.

The desk should face a light colored wall. If the desk surface is polished or covered with glass, use a light desk blotter.

• • •

FIXTURES OR lamps that are closed at the top or that have dark linings should be avoided. Light - diffusing translucent shields are preferred.

Finally, the experts recommend that you select a desk or work surface 28 to 29 inches above the floor.

The child's eyes, when he is seated, should be 14 inches above the desk. It may be necessary to prop him with pillows or to buy an adjustable chair to position him correctly with the light.

By ROGER J. NISSLY

Saddled with a presidential candidate many of them were not happy with from the start, local Republicans lent the tabulations rolled into their campaign headquarters Tuesday night.

While a scattering of enthusiasts watched the early television returns in the Lord Baltimore Hotel's ballroom, officials of the party joked cynically as the unfavorable tabulations rolled into the fourth floor offices which was guarded by a detective in uniform.

One angry GOP figure who was refused entrance by the guard until he could procure someone to vouch for him, later vented his displeasure in a telephone call to a leader seemingly more important than himself.

"There's a detective sitting on a desk in the hall keeping people out of the offices. He wouldn't let me in because I didn't have a card. It ought to be open to everybody. This is the way we lose elections."

• • •

AND LOSING they were, as was evident from the returns that came in shortly after the polls closed and from the unhappy jokes of the officials.

When one of the TV stations —which seemed to have an affinity for flashing obviously late vote totals on the screen —showed a Republican ahead by a large margin in the state, the group watching let out a loud laugh.

The "totals" prompted a young man to remark caustically, "But in your heart, you know he's lost."

He could have been speaking of Goldwater or of any of the Republican statewide GOP candidates, but reflected in his tone and the group's was a sympathy for defeated Senator J. Glenn Beall, who many felt was hurt in his bid for re - election by the top of the ticket.

By 9 p.m. the 77-year-old senator, who has spent 41 years in public service including 12 in the Senate and 10 in the House, had conceded to young Joseph Tydings.

In the talk to his backers' assembled in the ballroom, Beall, looking tired and harassed, thanked them for their "support for 41 years, almost the course of a man's life," and said that he wished the results would have been different.

After his words of thanks the senator received a ovation from the people who had turned from their TV watching to listen to him.

• • •

THE MOOD of the crowd in the bunting - festooned ballroom softened after the initial pangs of defeat and changed to a concern for the future of the party.

State Republican Chairman Newton Steers summed up this desire to take the party on a new track after its crushing defeat:

"We ought to learn a lesson from it and be guided by this lesson in the future."

On the heels of the overwhelmingly one - sided vote, party officials stated that they did not intend to follow up with action on any voting irregularities they uncovered during the massive poll watching Tuesday.

However, they said that a campaign would be waged for reform of the voting laws and education of election officials such as judges and policemen assigned to the polls.

• • •

AFTER IT was all over, including the shouting, one old lady in a trench coat —but minus the tennis sneakers — sat alone watching a TV set and muttering sadly to herself, "I'll bet Russia is happy tonight."

Perhaps because they felt responsible for the defeat, many of the rabid Goldwaterites and reactionaries were conspicuous by their absence at the wake-like celebration.

There was only one cowboy - hatted man present and most people played the role of "I told you so."

• • •

UPSTAIRS, THE youths who had worked hard during the campaign tore down their posters proclaiming, "In Your Heart You Know He's Right" and agreed among themselves that the results didn't show the amount of time they had spent.

A secretary told a TV cameraman, I have spent the last six months at his desk and this is the saddest moment of my life."

He replied, "Well, you can't win 'em all."

All " said the woman experiencing the saddest moment of her life. I'd just like to win one."

Just before leaving the ballroom, an old man asked a waiter behind one of the two tables laden with liquor bottles if the drinks were free. They weren't.
