ALABAMIAN, 78, SAYS

'If the Preside nt can take a stand, I guess I can too'

By FRANK HUNT
AFRO Staff Correspondent

SELMA, Ala. — Mrs. Rosie Steele, 78, shifted tired bones closer to the heat emanating from a potbellied coal stove at the rear of her grocery store, and listened to a newscast on the march to Montgomery.

Just outside the marchers were leaving a pasture which she owns about 1,000 yards from her house at the edge of "Big Swamp" in Lowndes County.

"At first I didn't think it amounted to much — I guess I've lived here too long and just didn't think things would change — until I heard the president's speech the other night.

The roar of an Army helicopter taking off nearby filled the room, and she paused.

"I didn't think much of him either, I was just telling my daughter the other day that he is just another white Southerner when I heard him talking about Vietnam. But when I heard him talking about Selma saying we had the right to vote, to march clear to Montgomery if we wanted to — I knew he was alright."

"I knew he was my President too."

• • •

OUTSIDE THE SINGLE story, four room, white frame house — the front room of which is a grocery store — Military policemen from Fort Benning and Fort Hood stood guard. They directed traffic around the marchers leaving the site. Six colored soldiers who held religiously to orders not to talk with newsmen, were among them.

"When they came to me and asked me if they could use my land I felt I couldn't afford to turn them down. If the President can take a stand, I guess I can too," she said.

She rose to replenish the fire. Her lined features were drawn into the perpetual frown of those who have grown old with problems, and younger with the years.

"He made that speech and made it clear that we have the right to stand up like men," she continued, seated once more.

Her hair, not yet completely gray, was tight in a red bandana and a dark cotton dress hung loose beneath a brown knit sweater on her spare frame. She wore a striped apron.

• • •

SHELVES BEHIND the low counter were less than half covered with canned goods, snuff, coffee, and tea. Other items were stored behind a higher counter which separated the area where she sat from the front of the store.

"I just keep a few things for the folks around here — they live so far away from town," she said, indicating the low stock.

"I made all I wanted to during the war when prices was up, but it's been nothing since then," she explained.

She owns some 200 acres of land in Lowndes and Wilcox County, which she bought during the war. Her husband died 20 years ago leaving her to raise six children, the youngest 12 years old.

Two of her sons, Roosevelt Steele, 60, and Eugene Steele 52, own a service station and another a grocery store across from the pasture where the marchers spent Monday night.

She has a daughter who teaches school in Chicago—Mrs. Rose Lee Harris.

NONE OF HER children are registered voters. There is reportedly one registered voter in Lowndes county who was allowed to register last week, but his name has not been revealed.

"It's been something you just didn't do around here— you didn't dare think about it," she said.

There are no real urban centers in the hilly and sparsely settled county. Haynesville, the county seat six miles off Highway 80, is a small town of less than 10,000.

The front door opened and a big man in thin stripped blue coverall— entered the room. She introduced him as her oldest son, Roosevelt. He remained standing by the high counter.

"I don't expect we'll have any trouble," he said in answer to the question. "Our customers are colored anyway.

• • •

MRS. STEELE took off a pair of battered loafers and rubbed her right foot. She had been standing outside earlier watching the marchers regroup in preparation for the day's march.

"It don't matter about trouble — we've had troubles ever since we've been born.

"But like Martin Luther King says we can't stop now. We got to go on.

"I don't know I almost feel like I might live long enough to vote myself," the Alabama native said softly.

Outside the marchers, 300 walking four abreast, were disappearing around a curve in the road, trailed by troops in jeeps, a hovering helicopter, a private car containing newsmen, and FBI men, and the strains of a favorite freedom song:

"I Woke Up This Morning With My Mind Set On Freedom. . . ."

'SPIRIT OF ' 65' — This flag corps symbolized the "Spirit of '65" for the "Freedom Marchers" in Montgomery, Alabama. From left, Dic Sakimer, Len Chandler, Jim and Louis Marshall braved all kinds of weather and hardships to keep the marchers spirit lifted.

Montgomery march seen greater than D.C. march

By FRANK HUNT
Afro Staff Correspondent
Selma - Montgomery march seen greater than March on D.C.

SELMA, Ala. — Some of the nation's top rights leaders, including two Nobel Peace Prize winners, feel that the voters' rights pilgrimage in Alabama this week will have a greater impact on the nation and equal rights than the historic march on Washington, D.C. in 1963.

They were with Dr. Martin Luther King at the forefront of the column of 6000 persons who trod the road to Montgomery to present a Voters Rights petition to Gov. Wallace.

While conceding the obvious differences in mass participation, most of the leaders felt that the Selma - Montgomery march was more meaningful. It is cited as beginning of a political revolution in the South, a "dash of cold water in the face of Northerners", and a demonstration of brotherhood "where it counts the most."

• • •

THE demonstrators came from as far west as Hawaii, and as far north as Canada. They were of all faiths, and most races.

Dr. Martin King, wearing soft-soled, low-cut shoes, which he called his "marching boots", said he felt that the long - range effect of the Selma demonstration would be larger.

"The oppressed people of Selma and Alabama, and throughout the South will know from what happened today that America cares about them."

• • •

The 1964 Nobel Peace prize winner said he expects more active support from northern civic and church groups as a result of the Selma situation.

• • •

HELMETED military police from Fort Hood, Tex., Fort Benning, Ga., were directing traffic as the procession neared the end of Selma's suburban shopping center on the other side of the Pettus Bridge. Several of them were colored.

A red, late model car passing by on the other side of the dual lane highway had signs on it saying.

"The March on Washington was an expression of general dissatisfaction while this is for a specific evil. But the events of Selma have "Fake priests for hire";

"Go home white trash"; and "We love Selma."

• • •

DRESSED in a light, knee-length coat, and a black lightweight suit, Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, 1950 Nobel Peace Prize winner, Undersecretary of the United Nations marched beside Dr. King. awakened the conscience of the nation — My own conscience tells me this is where I belong — and Congress is taking action on the basis of the overwhelming support appeal of the people," he said, looking back at the colorful column of marchers behind him.

"This is an awesome representation of concerned citizenry — one can't help but be impressed," he added.

• • •

MRS. Constance Baker Motley, newly appointed president of the Manhattan Borough in New York City, said, "without a doubt what happens here in Selma will determine how quickly we'll get a Voters Registration Bill. I'm here to demonstrate that public officials wholly support the right to vote."

Gerald A. Lamb, State Treasurer of Connecticut and the highest elected colored official in the state, said, "As an elected official, I realize he importance of het ballot box in the American political and social structure. This march is a greater witness, aimed at the most basic appeal, than any other single similar event in the South in recent years."

• • •

MRS. Ruby Hurley, Director of the Southeastern Region NAACP Conference, w h o s e area includes Alabama, said,

"I know what it's been like here all these years. This is not just a walk to Montgomery — it's a giant stride toward freedom for these people."

"Washington D.C. was a dramatic appeal to the nation — but here is the heart of the problem, and it means something to Southern colored people to see the appeal made right here."

Comedian Dick Gregory, who has been arrested at the Holiday Inn for trying to get accommodations, earlier this year, was also near the head of the column.

He said, "In Washington, D.C. we showed we were just tired, but not mad. Today, here in Alabama, we are both tired and mad."

• • •

LES EVERS, brother of the assassinated NAACP field representative Medgar Evers, said the march was "unprecedented."

"The March on Washington was a great thing. The country showed concern. But for these people to come out here — where death and violence has taken place — is something else."

John Lewis, head of the Student Non - Violent Coordinating Committee, called the walk "strange and wonderful."

"This is the frontline — DC. was the command post. When you get these many people on the frontline for justice, something is happening in this country."

Lewis suffered a fractured skull from state troopers' billy clubs during the abortive March 7 attempt to walk to Montgomery.

2 Services for Mrs. Wittington
