Wage unit denies deal on hotel back-pay issue

The Minimum Wage Commission, in a two - hour public hearing Monday evening, rejected a claim by attorneys for the city's four major hotels that an agreement between them waived the rights of their employees to collect retroactive wage increases, amounting to $75,000.

The ruling is seen as setting the stage for a possible court test case covering the whole matter of the involvement of hotels under the law.

Walter R. Tabler and Alexander M. Harvey 2nd, attorneys for the hotels, charged that the state minimum wage law does not cover hotels, and thus takes precedent as a general law over the city law which does.

On this basis, they refused to produce employment records that had been under subpoena by the commission, in an effort to determine how much is due each employee.

The four hotels, Lord Baltimore, Emerson, Sheraton - Belvedere and Sheraton Inn, began complying with the city's $1 an hour minimum wage law last Dec. 6, according to testimony.

However, the city law went into effect a year earlier on Dec. 4, 1964.

* * *

AT ISSUE Monday evening was an alleged agreement between the two attorneys and Archie M. Jones, commission member, and Joseph A. Bush, commission director.

The attorneys charged this agreement held that there would be no certification of employees for retroactive pay for the period between when the ordinance became effective up to when the hotels began complying.

Both Messrs. Jones and Bush strongly denied this, and pointed out that as individuals they had no authority to bind the commission in such an agreement, or any other for that matter.

"I am dismetrically opposed because of my color," Mr. Jones, the lone member of his race on the commission, said heatedly," to people working for nothing.

"It has always been my position that if the smaller hotels can comply there is no reason why the larger ones can't."

BERNARD RUBENSTEIN, attorney for the hotel employees, told the commission even if there had been some such agreement, his position was that it was not binding on the workers he represented.

Approximately 100 of these hotel employees appeared for the hearing, held in the Board Room at City Hall beginning at 7:44 p.m.

They had come mainly to testify as to their claims for back wages due.

This was not possible because of (1) the arguments on the alleged agreement and (2) the refusal of the hotels to present the ordered employment records.

William O. Doub, commission chairman, explained this to the crowd and apologized for having caused some inconvenience of apperring.

In a closing reminder, Mr. Jones told the hotels' attorneys that even if the state law did take precedence over the city ordinance, they still owed back wages.

The state law, he stated, went in effect in June, 1965, six months after the city law was signed in December, 1964.

"Your hotels didn't comply with the law during that period," he said, "so you're subject to back pay for that time."
