Secretary miffed at violence talk; other views differ

Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz has charged that persistent talk about the possibility of violence is making summertime explosions more likely. Others continue to blame government inaction.

Some Senators were unwittingly encouraging violence in American cities this summer by spreading the "misleading" notion that the Johnson administration "was doing nothing to prevent it," Wirtz said.

Secretary Wirtz quoted Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff as saying there would be another "long, hot summer", in part because "there are basically no plans and no programs to take of pending potential explosive situations."

"We are going to have another summer with turmoil and violence and demonstrations, and everybody is going to scurry around to get some portable swimming pools and say this is terrible," Sen. Ribicoff was quoted as saying.

* * *

SECRETARY WIRTZ said this assertion was "warranted and advisable to whatever extent the facts support the assessment; beyond that, it contributes materially to the likelihood of that explosion."

The cabinet member's views were not shared by several other leaders.

* * *

REP. JOHN CONYERS, JR. (D-Mich.) charged that "Congress complains about the increasing annual summer disorders without realistically attempting to deal with their basic social and economic causes."

"How can members of Congress continually criticize these acts of violence without at the same time realistically working to eliminate the causes of violence?" he asked.

"Many ghetto residents have tragically concluded that violent protest is the only means of attacking the increasing frustration and hopelessness of their lives."

Rep. Conyers urges his colleagues to recognize that justice is linked to domestic tranquility.

In Waukegan, Ill., Marvin Smith, vice-president, NAACP, charged that Mayor Robert Sabonjian "has intensified the hospitality between colored and whites. "I think the colored community is at the point where it's returning to hostility."

"Waukegan is just as pregnant for trouble today as it was last summer," when violence broke out, said the Rev. John Devine, pastor, Gurnee Community church and chairman, housing committee, Lake County Conference on Religion and Race.

IN MILWAUKEE, a militant colored leader warned that "We're taking over Milwaukee" unless police stop harassing people.

Ferthune Humphrey, Jr., who sounded the warning, said "We have a little organization outside the (NAACP) Youth council called the Black Revengers," which Humphrey said he helps lead. He gave government officials a month to act, before the Revengers move in.

In Cleveland, Lewis G. Robinson, black nationalist leader, predicted another summer of violence in that tense city.

"The only weapon black people have is the violence and discontent of the young," said Robinson.

"Without a crash program of long duration, controlled by the ghetto people themselves, there's not a prayer of a chance."

Wilkins lauds Allen students, raps lawmakers' proposals

The president of Allen University was fired late Thursday by the School's board of trustees — apparently because of his support of a white faculty dean.

President Benjamin J. Glover met with the school's trustees shortly after commencement exercises were held at the small college that is run by the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

COLUMBIA, S.C. (UPI) — Civil rights leader Roy Wilkins congratulated Allen University students Thursday for recent class boycotts and criticised national lawmakers for what he termed attempts to "water down" the 1964 civil rights act.

Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, spoke at Allen's commencement exercises — held little more than two weeks after most of the 900 students at the college all but closed the campus in a dispute over the hiring of a teacher.

A white dean of faculty, V. Dewey Annakin, had recommended the teacher be fired for "incompetence." Though he was backed up by Allen President B. J. Glover, the school's Board of Trustees forced rehiring of the teacher.

Annakin resigned and the student body started its classroom strike and a series of demonstrations.

"I count it an honor to give the commencement address at an institution whose student body is insisting on excellence in instruction and learning, even to the point of striking and boycotting," Wilkins told the students.

"The students of Allen and the parents who support them should be saluted for their stand . . . against the forces that wish to make this campus a place of conformity, even if it means mediocrity."

WILKINS SAID proposals made by several congressmen, including Rep. L. M. Fountain, D-N.C., tended to hurt the effectiveness of the civil rights act.

The House recently adopted an amendment by Fountain requiring that no federal school funds allocated under Title Six of the 1964 law be withheld from any school district until after a hearing is held.

"This means that hearings could be lengthy, could be spread over a long period, could be appealed, with a final decision delayed a full school year or more," he said. "Meanwhile, the school district would be getting its federal funds and going its merry, discriminating way. Meanwhile, the colored children would continue to be segregated and given inferior education."

Wilkins told the students that segregation and racism is still cropping up around the country.

"In Jacksonville, Fla., last Sunday I was told there had been almost no progress toward desegregation of the schools. In Boston, the woman who, as president of the school board blocked the correction of gross racial imbalance in the public schools, has just filed for the office of mayor," he said.

WILKINS pointed out "South Africa, the flourishing citadel of racism,' and 'over in Alabama a slick campaigner behind the vote-catching masquerade of states' rights' (an obvious reference to former Alabama Gov. George Wallace) as evidence that white supremacy still exists in America.
