To Be Equal

A salute to Dean John Monro

By
WHITNEY M. YOUNG JR.

There are few positions in American higher education more important or sought after than that of Dean of Harvard College. There are few positions less sought after than that of staff member of a small, unaccredited college in the South.

Yet the Dean of Harvard College, Dr. John U. Monro, recently quit his job to take the position of Director of Freshman Studies at Miles College in Birmingham, Ala. This step had the effect of an atomic blast on the educational community. Many people just didn't understand why anyone would leave a position laden with prestige and status to face the tasks of working in a college in the Deep South.

Dean Monro gave the answer: "I want to disassociate myself from any idea that this is a sacrifice," he said, "I see it as a job of enormous reward." He set an example other educators should follow.

The challenge of deeply influencing the course of education in colleges whose student bodies come from backgrounds of poverty and segregation is far more rewarding to men whose intellectual vigor is matched by their sense of moral justice, than teaching in our established and prestigious institutions.

• • •

MILES COLLEGE is an excellent example of the important work being done by the colored colleges in the South. For the past three summers, under brilliant and dedicated President, Dr. Lucius Pitts, Dean Monro has taken part in the development of a new curriculum for freshmen and a program of grooming high school students for college work.

Miles is the only college accessible to students in the Birmingham area. Most of them attend the segregated high school which has a student body of 4,000.

By focusing on these students, motivating them to continue their education and providing remedial work to heal the scars of their poor, segregated public school training, Miles is living up to the highest responsibilities of American colleges. Few others, with greater prestige and resources, are doing nearly as much.

About half the colored college students in the country — 100,000 — attend predominantly colored colleges. Many of them are doing so at great sacrifice to their families. Their own efforts to help others often keeps them from continuing their own education. One student said: "I'd like so much to go to grad school, but I've got to get my sister through college first."

• • •

THIS SACRIFICE and dedication to the goals of higher education is one of the great unsung stories today. If Dean Monro did nothing else, he deserves the gratitude of all Americans for focusing national attention on the needs and dedication of the students attending these schools.

They labor under great handicaps. Our big universities have millions of dollars endowment income, but these schools have to scrape along on a shoestring. While some support comes from the United College Fund and other institutions and individuals, there is a crying need for massive help to enable them to do the job which must be done.

They are certainly being shortchanged not only by private sources, but also by government. For example, only 2.7 percent of all state aid to higher education went to predominantly colored colleges, and they got a shameful less than 1 percent of all federal aid.

Some new monetary help is coming from programs like the Urban League's Summer Fellowship program. This program enlists business firms which provide summer employment for faculty members, giving them the experience with the techniques of modern industry, which they can then impart to their students.

THE COLLEGES offer the only chance for most high school graduates in the South to continue their education and in addition to this task, many of the colleges are also enrolling poor white students from their areas.

This year, Howard University marks its 100th anniversary, and this month thousands of students graduate from Howard and the more than 200 other predominantly colored colleges.

Both events are reminders of the important role these schools play in American education. They have educated many of America's most prominent artists, lawyers, doctors, and others, most of whom would not have been able to attain the heights of their professions without the training they got at these schools.

Arena Players excellent in Hughes' 'Tamborines'

By ADAH K. JENKINS

"Tamborines to Glory" brought to the Arena Players' final offering of the season a gem of Langston Hughes' choice humor that only too often hides a tear.

Entitled a "gospel musical," the plot is set in the tenements of Harlem and is about the adventures of "Essie," an old inhabitant and her foot-loose neighbor, "Laura."

The two decided to better their condition by "saving souls." During their first success on a street corner Laura meets a man about town, "Big-Eyed Buddy Lomax," who has already introduced himself to the audience during an hilariously sinister prologue, as the Devil.

Thru Buddy's influence in the ghetto the three set up Tamborine Temple where they dispense religion, "numbers" and fake holy water along with the rafter-rocking songs of the Tamborine Choir.

WHEN ESSIE'S young daughter arrives from the South, the liaison between Buddy and Laura becomes strained and events move to an exciting conclusion.

It's all there — the ever present conflict of good and evil, against the grim background of the ghetto and a strange unquenchable hope for the future. Langston Hughes saw it and drew the picture with sharp yet unerring skill.

With Sam Wilson's discerning direction the Arena Players gave a remarkably realistic production, true to life yet not exaggerated.

Earl Burton, who plays the part of Buddy, makes him an almost likeable villian. (Bob-by Lloyd is alternate

• • •

WITH HER oft demonstrated skill in senior citizen roles, Mary Carter Smith is believable sincere as Essie.

In the role of Laura, Barbara Mealy was admirable, altho a bit too refined.

As Gloria, the cabaret singer who fell for Buddy, Marie Bailey was an eyefull, altho more in the Broadway ilk than Harlem.

The return of Verna Day, well known Arena veteran, was a delight, and she never missed a beat on her drum accompaniments to the choir.

Rebecca Davis, as the daughter and Julius Wilson, guitar player in the Temple, afforded a tender love theme. (Yvonne Stokes is alternate)

With the support of Geneva Hillen, Temple soloist, Ed Heathe, Jimmy Page, Alex Reeder, Roy Upton, Lou Straitne and Jimmmy Dow the production was completed adequately.

Under the direction of Victor Myrick, at the organ, with pianist Audrey White, the choir kept spirituals, hymns and gospel songs at a foot-tapping clip.

Suitable settings and lighting were handled by Harvey Denmark, Patricia Ford, Carroll Seward and Zerita Skates.

• • •

AS AN excellent example of this new dramatic technic, "Tamborines to Glory" should be seen. Arena players will repeat it June 9, 10 and 17 and 18. at the Playhouse, 406 Orchard Street.

A member of organizations are sponsoring benefit performances, including the Piano Teachers Activity Group, patrons for last Saturday. Brief outlines of the group program were given by Mrs. Gwendolyn Lassiter, coordinator and Mrs. Florence Carter, chairman for the project.
