

encouraging our friends and neighbors to go to the polls, I suggest that all of us from time to time recall the advice of Edmund Burke.

"All that is necessary for the forces of evil to win in the world," Burke said, "is for enough good men to do nothing."

The good people of Kentucky did not achieve greatness for this State by doing nothing. For, from a hostile wilderness your forebears carved a society that has inspired poets, novelists, songwriters and historians. It is my strong belief that the hostile wilderness which the Republican candidate for President offers Kentucky, Maryland and all the states of this nation and all the nations of the world will be firmly rejected on November 3rd.

I urge you to go to the polls on election day and take your family, friends and neighbors with you so that the future peace and prosperity of this nation may be protected with a resounding victory for Lyndon Johnson, Hubert Humphrey and your seven congressional candidates.

In closing, permit me to once again express my gratitude to you present here today and to the people of Kentucky for inviting me to visit with you. It has been a delightful experience for me—one which I shall enjoy sharing with my fellow Marylanders when I return home.
