Black enrollment doubles at UMBC

In his recent annual State of the University address, Dr. Albin O. Kuhn, chancellor for the Baltimore Campuses of the University of Maryland, stressed the importance of self-evaluation.

The five-year-old campus in Baltimore County, has reached a point in its development where growth over the next few years could lead to the mushrooming of the student body to what could be an enrollment of greater than ten thousand within six years, he said, and added:

"Application rates for the 1971-72 academic year are running better than 60 percent ahead of those of one year ago at this time.

"Admission in 1970 ran over projected estimates, so it is expected that about 4,000 students will spend the 1971 school year at UMBC."

Noting that black enrollment had more than doubled at UMBC between 1969 and 1970, Dr. Kuhn emphasized that if controlled size is indicated, nothing should interfere with the increase in black student enrollment.

Although current employment practices have not resulted in adequate representation of blacks and women on the faculty and staff, Dr. Kuhn said, "We must find ways and means to eliminate this discrimination whether it is intentional or a product of neglect."

Dr. Kuhn ended his address by telling the large gathering that, as a result of the recent Regents' decision to separate the two Baltimore campuses by fall 1971, he would be leaving UMBC to spend full time at the city professional school campus.

He has requested President Wilson Elkins to appoint a search committee to nominate a new chancellor for UMBC.

Black studies grant goes to U. of Md.

Ties between black leadership and the white liberal establishment in the early 20th century will be examined under the terms of a $3,500 Ford Foundation Fellowship to a University of Maryland instructor in Afro-American History.

Raymond W. Smock, doctoral candidate in Afro-American History, was awarded the grant to explore the relationships that existed between such black leaders as Booker T. Washington and W.E.B. DuBois, and one of the white founders of the NAACP, Oswald Garrison Villard.

Mr. Smock received the grant from a new Ford Foundation program established to encourage scholarship in the field of ethnic studies.

Initial awards totaling $288,052 will enable 87 PH.D. candidates at fifty-four graduate schools to write their dissertations on subjects dealing with the experience and culture of ethnic minorities in the United States. The recipients in the first year's competition were selected from 153 applicants nominated by graduate deans.

A 23-year resident of Harvey, Illinois, where he attended Thornton High School and Thornton Junior College, Mr. Smock is married to the former Miss Phyllis Chadwick of Lansing, Ill.

In addition to serving as an instructor at the University of Maryland, he is also assistant editor of the 12-volume The Booker T. Washington Papers, being edited by Dr. Louis R. Harlan of the University's History Department.
