Hit placement of children in special units

TWIN PEAKS, Calif. — Black Educator Oliver Hurley told a national conference on the placement of children in special education classes for the mentally retarded here today that the social result of labeling children as handicapped and placing them in special education classes has often been "to maintain the status quo" in education.

Such labeling and placement, Hurley said, "has served to provide a rationalization for our failures as teachers of black children, our failures as teachers of brown children, our failures as teachers of poor children."

• • •

"Even the learning disabilities movement," Hurley continued, "has served as a mechanism for blaming the child rather than ourselves, his teachers, for his failure to learn."

Hurley, who is professor of special education at Yeshiva University, New York City, gave one of the three basic papers presented for discussion by the 100 educators, state agency officials, voluntary organization leaders and human development specialists attending the 3-day conference at the Southern California Teachers Association conference center here.

The conference is sponsored by President Nixon's Committee on Mental Retardation, the Bureau of Education for the Handicapped of the U.S. Office of Education, and the Council for Exceptional Children, a professional group of specialists working in school programs for the handicapped and gifted children.

Solutions to the "institutionalized injustice" of using tests and special class placements to maintain social patterns unchanged, Hurley said, include demanding teacher accountability for successful results in their classroom work and substitution, in educators' and program planners' thinking, of human values for the "property values" on which he charged much of U.S. society's attitudes toward minority group children has been based.

In a response to Hurley's paper, Louis Bransford, director of special education at the University of New Mexico, said that special education as a field is not a culprit, but that people in schools or agencies who carry out and continue unjust or inaccurate procedures for testing and placement of children in special classes are engaging in "bigotry."

If such institutionalized injustice is to be overcome, Bransford said, "we must start with the training institutions that prepare the people who do the testing and the teaching."

The majority of people emerging from training programs in intelligence and achievement test administration, Bransford said, know how to manipulate blocks and carry out other test techniques, but they often don't know how to interpret test results. To underscore the seriousness of labeling and placement based on poor interpretation of test results, Bransford suggested that study be made of the possibility that child mislabeling be made a criminal offense.

Also needed, Bransford said, are classroom materials that are culturally sensitive to the children being worked with in the school. "What we forget is that the special class student often has already failed in the system, and to intensify the kind of instruction he has already failed at can result only in creating hostility and withdrawal."

The conference at which Hurley and Bransford spoke is focusing on the child testing, evaluation and placement process in the schools, the social implications of special class placement, and recent legal developments bearing on school testing and placement activities. The conference's finding and recommendations are scheduled for announcement at a news conference in Los Angeles, March 10.

Woman grocer kills robber

LITTLE ROCK — Jerome Raynor Jr., 25, was fatally shot during an apparent robbery attempt at Porter's Grocery Store. The police said Raynor was fatally wounded by a shot from a .22 caliber pistol which Mrs. Willie Mae Porter, the store owner said she fired.

Mrs. Porter, 69, said she was sitting in the back of her store when a young man came in. She asked if she could help him. He reportedly turned a sawed off shot gun on her and asked, "Have you got any money?"

She told him she had none, but he reportedly forced her to open the cash register. Mrs. Porter had her pistol under her apron and as she opened the register with her left hand she held the pistol with her right.

The man "went after the money" in the register, and she stepped away from him and shot him with her pistol, she said.

This was the fourth robbery attempt at the store during the last 10 years. The other three were successful.
