FDA warns on faulty candy beads

The Food and Drug Administration warned this week that a nationally marketed brand of imported candy beads contains high levels of cadmium, a toxic heavy metal, and presents a moderate to severe health hazard to children.

F.D.A. analysis of the beads revealed cadmium levels of 1000 parts per million concentrated in an edible medallion attached to the beads.

At least 15 injuries attributed to the beads have been reported in Illinois, where the problem was first uncovered, and in California and Washington State.

Symptoms following ingestion of the candy beads are described as severe stomach pains, vomiting, lethargy and drowsiness approaching unconsciousness. Onset of the symptoms has been reported to occur within 10 to 60 minutes of ingestion. Recovery ordinarily takes place within a few hours.

Cholera vaccine for tourists

For travelers going abroad this year, Dr. Howard J. Garber, chief of the Division of Communicable Diseases, Maryland State Department of Health, has announced that cholera vaccine is required for tourists traveling to countries reporting cholera, located pricipally in South and Southeast Asia and Africa.

In addition, Dr. Garber said, foreign countries without cholera present also may require immunization for travelers. Local or state health departments should be contacted for additional information.

The United States, however, does not require cholera immunization for reentry, even from countries reporting cholera.

Cholera is present mainly in rural areas; therefore the disease will not be a threat to the usual tourist or businessman.

The International Certificate of Vaccination must be stamped by the state or local health department or other authorized officials and is good for six months. On primary vaccination, the certificate does not become valid until six days after the vaccine is given.

Maternity appointments now required

The Baltimore Maternity Center, 211 W. Lombard St., is now requiring patients to make appointments before they come by calling 752-0380 or 752-0381, according to Maternity Center Director Dr. George Davis.

"We want to keep patients happy, and there are bad feelings if we can't fit them in," Dr. Davis said. "Usually we can give an appointment to a woman so she can come in within two days of the time she calls."

Dr. Davis advised expectant mothers to see a doctor as early in pregnancy as possible. If she has no family physician, she may obtain comprehensive care before and after the birth of her baby through the Maternity Center, a federal and locally financed project.

The Maternity Center is open to any women who live in Baltimore City and who is pregnant or who thinks she is. Most of the women who come to the center are new patients. During their first visit at the Maternity Center, the Maternity Center, they go through thorough health screenig.

Later prenatal check-ups are arranged in the City Health Department's health districts nearer their homes. After the baby is born, nurses make home visits and clinics are provided to help guard the health of mother and child.
