BARC helps retarded adults train for jobs in industry

They cannot read or write. Their speech is not good. They can follow only the simplest of directions.

Two of the seven children of Mrs. Hattie Douglas, of N. Cumberland St., are mentally retarded. Both contacted spinal meningitis which damaged their brains during infancy.

Nevertheless, James, now 26, and Louis, 22, enjoy a daily program of productive activity.

Robert George of the State Department of Vocational Rehabilitation sent the brothers to the Baltimore Association for Retarded Children, where they were both evaluated and placed in a "work-activity" program.

"Before placing anyone in a program, we give him extensive tests to determine just what his capacities are," explains Mrs. Kelly de Barros, BARC social worker.

At BARC's newest Activity Center, operated in the Liberty Heights area in conjunction with the Model Cities Agency, James and Louis are taught simple skills that enable them to become more self-reliant, while they are training for simple work in industry.

Contracts for jobs such as sorting, stuffing and sealing envelopes are solicited by BARC from local business and industry to enable youngsters like Louis and James to become productive citizens, under sheltered workshop conditions.

"Depending on the progress made," Mrs. de Barros said, "We often are successful in placing mentally retarded adults in private industry.

"Helping the mentally retarded is our primary goal, but relieving a family of a burdensome problem is always a satisfying by-product," she added.

Quakers fight for OEO

WASHINGTON — A Quaker spokesman accused the government of criminal negligence against the poor if the Office Of Economic Opportunity (OEO) "is allowed to die through non-extension, insufficient funding or dismemberment by executive reassignment of programs."

The accusation was made by William G. Lunsford, legislative representative for human rights for the Friends Committee on National Legislation, before the Senate Employment, Manpower and Poverty Subcommittee.
