Panel Votes War Limit

The course has been set for a Senate vote next year, during the Presidential campaign, on sweeping legislation to stop presidents from committing American troops abroad on their own.

The unusual bill, which would require a president to obtain congressional consent for committing troops to battle for longer than 30 days, cleared the Senate Foreign Relations Committee 13 to 0 this week, despite opposition from the adminstration. It has strong bipartisan backing from both hawks and doves. Sen. John Stennis, D-Miss., the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, is one of its authors.

No schooling, few cosmetics, but she's in-the-lead model

NATURAL BEAUTY, simple elegance is the forte of High Fashion Model Beverly Johnson, whose dreams are of fireside, not of Hollywood.

She didn't attend modeling school. She uses few cosmetics. She doesn't diet. And when she isn't modeling high fashion clothes, you will likely find her in jeans.

Yet, she is one of the country's top models.

Meet Beverly Johnson, wife, law student, and with no plans or desires to become a movie star.

Mrs. Johnson, a bright, soft-spoken young woman, was a freshman in college two years ago. Today, as one of America's top models, she is featured in the holiday fashion pages of Glamour Magazine's December issue.

Born and raised in Buffalo, N.Y., she graduated from Bennett High School, and entered Northeastern University in Boston, Mass. "All during my freshman year friends told me that I should be a model," Beverly says. "So when summer came, I headed for New York City with my mother."

The Ford Model Agency liked her height — 5'8", her weight — 120 pounds, and her flawless, radiant complexion, and in no time she found herself appearing in many fashion features. "I didn't train for modeling at all," she says, "I was nervous in the beginning but I got over that quickly."

• • •

In September of 1970 she was off to Capri, Italy for the Ford-sponsored "International Model of the Year Contest," where she was second runner-up.

Beverly thinks fashion is fun. She says "the 40s look is great for parties."

Her shining complexion is not the result of expensive potions and hours of facial care. "I only scrub my face with soap three times a week. The rest of the time, I use a steaming hot wash cloth to clean my skin and a little cotton with rubbing alcohol for the oily areas of my face."

Her make-up is as simple as it is subtle. "False eyelashes are out — and I don't use mascara too often either. I use some blusher, a little under-eye highlighter, some white shadow, and maybe a little lip gloss.

To keep in shape, she swims twice a week but never diets — "It's too hard, and besides I don't want to be one of those really skinny models."

Mrs. Johnson enjoys her modeling and has no plans for film acting. She is married and lives in Brooklyn, N.Y. with her husband, William, who is studying to be a real estate broker. She studies criminal law at New York University night school, and says of her future, "I love my work and I love school, but in a few years I want to start having children. I guess I really ust want to be a good wife and mother more than anything."

Volunteers dead or alive? is Women's Council topic

Volunteers in all types of agencies, hospitals and homes have long been an asset to the American way of life. However, is voluntarism dead of alive today?

This was the question discussed by a panel of six at the United Fund Women's Council Symposum at the Baltimore Hebrew Congregation recently.

Aim of the meeting was to explore and find answers to the problem of keeping voluntarism alive in agencies throughout the U.S.

Cecil S. Feldman, executive director of Community Services of Pennsylvania, suggested, "Thele is hope of keeping voluntarism alive today, what must be done is Americans must consolidate their efforts to help those people that are suffering and in need of social services.

• • •

"Our salvation is in our watchfulness as citizens. We must individually move into action as volunteers."

David Glenn, director of the Baltimore City Community Relations Commission observed, "One flaw about volunteers is that they are not fully informed, specifically in the agencies they work for, the latest techniques, the public they serve and the problems they are dealing with.

"Volunteers need to be more critical of the agencies they serve. They are too satisfied with the traditional thrust of the agency."

• • •

Keynote speaker was Mrs. Theodore O. Wedel, associate director of the Center for a voluntary Society she asserted, "Voluntarism is not dead, but it is in danger. We must recognize the tremendous importance of volunteers in our society."

She added: — "We've got to keep our volunteer agencies open so that people can have an option."

Other panelists included: John G. Geist, associate director of Health and Welfare Council, Joseph A. Mafera, executive director, Legal Aide Bureau Inc., Alfred C. Joyner, executive director of Echo House and Maurice A. Harmon, director of the Department of Social Services of Baltimore City.

Luncheon for the over 300 guests was packed in brown paper sacks tied with bright pink ribbon.

Chairman of the Women's Council is Mrs. Clyde M. Clapp; Mesdames Jack Pearistone and Carl R. Lundbald are co-chairmen.

Among guests were Mesdames Raymond Hayebert, Ethel Day, Walter Dixon, Saul Purdie, Walter Roper, Edna D. Johnson, Mary Clayborn, Mary Murray, Lois Carter, Juanita J. Young, Thelma Cox and Mary Fitzgerald; Arthur Redding, assistant director of the Community Chest. Harold Kennedy, Ralph Cole and Michael Johnson.
