Court denies accused park slayer release

Reginald Vernon Oates, 23, charged with the 1968 deaths of four young boys and molesting six children, was ruled incompetent to stand trial Wednesday after four years of psychiatric treatment.

Judge James A. Perrott remanded the defendant to furthercare of officials at the Clifton T. Perkins State Hospital where Oates has been confined since a 1968 Criminal Court decision declared him legally insane.

Judge Perrott stated, "He is obviously still very sick," at the conclusion of the sanity hearing in Baltimore City Court.

Oates, who petitioned the court for his relase from the hospital, stated, "I was just too sick" when asked why he committed the crimes. He later stated "I think I'm pretty well now".

Dr. Robert Sauer, psychiatrist stated he interviewed Oates yesterday at the hospital.

"Mr. Oates still shows clear signs of schizophrenia (a mental disorder) and in my opinion this still represents a clear danger to others", the doctor said.

Oates is accused of slashing the throats of two teen-year-old youths and two brothers, 5 and 8-years old, during April 1968. Sixteen indictments against Oates include charges that he molested four young boys and two girls, records reveal.

According to police, the incidents allegedly occurred in Leakin Park in the Edmondson Village area.

Prison writers show society ignored creativity, Young says

ATLANTA (UPI) — Southern college admission officials were told last week that society had "ignored some of the most intelligent and creative people that we have" in the nation's black population.

Andrew Young, chairman of the Atlanta Community Relations Commission, told the Southern Association of College Admission Counselors "if you look at the output of writers in the black community, more of the prisons than have come from the streets and from creative writers have come from the colleges.

"And that's not so much an indictment of our colleges as such. It's saying that our entire society has ignored some of the most intelligent, creative people that we have."

* * *

Young, a candidate for Congress and a top aide to the late Dr. Martin Luther King, also said he felt student turmoil was "probably going to be one of the most wholesome things as we look back on it, because it's going to mean that we're going to have more relevant, more representative education . . ."

He said such ferment on the campuses was a necessary part of sorely needed change.

* * *

He said the nation had probably been through "half a dozen" revolutions in transportation but "all we've done educationally is put springs and rubber wheels on an oxcart."

Dyer Moss, president of the association, said he didn't feel the "tremendous pressure" to go to college would continue over the next five years.

Moss said college degrees usually meant "white collar jobs" and in many cases such jobs will mean a cut in pay as compared to "blue collar" jobs.

Over 1,000 students in Early Admission classes

The Early Admission program in the public schools is an educational plan designed to improve children's ability to learn, to promote learning and to assure attention to the total development of children.

There are 1,270 children in such classes in Baltimore. Mrs. Velma Evans is program administrator.

The AFRO had a chance to visit an Early Admission class at School 95, in the 1400 block of Lexington St., where Mrs. Louise Gee Murphy is principal.

Most people think of Early Admission students as just spending a few hours in school playing, but this is not true.

Students who are enrolled in this program are four years old. Each class has 20 children with a teacher, two full time aides and a parent liaison worker.

The main objectives of the program is to provide a comprehensive program for pre-kindergarten children.

Some of the things th students are taught are visual and auditory perceptual skills, their colors, numbers, how to recognize different shapes, body control, development of effective relationships with others.

There are two of these classes at school 95 under the direction of Mrs. Essie Coleman and Mrs. Delores Washington. Mrs. Margaret Beaman is program assistant.

Criteria is used to select children to be enrolled in the program such as low family income, limited educational opportunity of members of the family, problems with which the family is attempting to cope with.

Each day, students receive a well balanced lunch. There are 32 Early Admission classrooms in 25 public schools.

Each school has an Early Admission parent advisory committee which helps make decisions about the program in its school.
