Career Day helps seniors to open college doors

WASHINGTON

Career Day, which was a coordinated effort by America's colleges to give Washington school students a chance to see what they have to offer, drew a tremendous response and varying opinions over whether a black or white insti... is better suited for a youth's academic growth.

Public school projects, Open and Access initiated the program to interest mostly 11th graders who would be eligible for college in 1973.

Nathaniel Hill, D.C. supervisor of Guidance section in the Public Schools, commented that 12th graders by May had either been accepted into college, choosen other advanced training, or sought employment.

He was also optimistic about its future. Hill said that before the program began 65.1 per cent of the area students had applied for college, according to his 1969 statistics.

The program lasted at the D.C. Armory from 9-5 p.m. Public schools were admitted between 9 a.m. and 3 p.m., followed by parochial, and people who might be interested in college from the community.

Nearly 120 colleges were represented at the Career Day activities. Possibly the most striking contrast among them were their philosophies.

For instance, Robert Whitehead is a dorm director and counselor at Johnson C. Smith University in North Carolina. His attitude was in agreement with other schools who attended the discussions.

"Usually black kids who go to white colleges attend for a semester and find that only whites are getting over.

Whitehead's explanation appeared to be backed by hundreds of youths gathering around the more popularly known black schools to sign for applications and other background information regarding the institutions, that soon ran out at the tables.

Possibly the only predominately white schools that were able to compete with their black counterparts for the attentions of high school students were American and Maryland Universities.

Mary Braxton, a senior in history and communications represented American University. She was honest and quite candid towards the bevy of students who asked her about problems facing urban blacks at a predominately white institution.

"When you decide upon a school you have to see what is in it for you," she said. In my case it was better for me to go to American rather than Howard because they did not have a communications department at the time. The one they have now is just getting started," she noted.

She admitted that many blacks leave because they do not feel comfortable at white schools, then added that "if you can back it, they generally have more money to offer you."

Miss Braxton later mentioned to students that enrollment of blacks at American Universly has doubled since 1968 then only 50 blacks were among the 1,600 incoming freshman students.

Maryland's Phil Bass called the plight at black college's "dog eat dog." "In a white school blacks at least must stick together through necessity. They don't have to at black schools.

"Here we are forced to develop our black consciousness." He illustrated his point by handing a reporter a photograph that showed where someone had scribbled 'white power' on the black student union.
