Ceiling imposed on Waxter Center

Robert C. Hilson, Director of Maryland's Department of Juvenile Services, announced today he has advised juvenile court judges and masters that, effective July 1, he is placing a ceiling on the number of male recipients at the Thomas J. W. Waxter Children's Center, near Laurel.

The Center is designed for short-term detention and evaluation for juveniles to age 17, and makes recommendations to the courts regarding appropriate treatment for the youths committed to it.

This action is required, he said, to maintain security, to safeguard the children committed to the Center for evaluation, and to assist the staff, whose abilities are seriously hindered by the overpopulation.

In his letter to the judges, Mr. Hilson said, "overcrowding at the Waxter Children's Center has been a problem for the Department for a considerable period of time.

"There have been times when the boys' unit, with the capacity for 20 boys, has had triple that number of youths in residence.

"It is obvious that such overcrowding limits the supervision available to these youths. Further, health and safety standards cannot be maintained."

• • •

Between now and July 1, the male population will be reduced to 30 by a combination of transfers to previously unavailable facilities, and court-approved releases.

The Department of Juvenile Services has arranged for substitute detention facilities wherever necessary.

Juvenile court judges and masters, as well as Departmental staff members, are fully familiar with the alternatives, Mr. Hilson said.

Mr. Hilson said that he has discussed the situation at Waxter Center with court authorities involved and expressed to them his appreciation for their understanding and cooperative spirit.

The Director also stated that the female population at Waxter will not be affected by this order. During the last nine years, overcrowding has not been a problem in the girls' unit.
