Consumers get warning about beef

Local consumers were cautioned this week to be sure that they are getting the real thing when purchasing ground beef by Attorney General Francis B. Burch.

• • •

The legal limit in Maryland for ground beef is 30 per cent fat content.

In recent weeks, two stores — Giddie's Supermarket and Foodarama Market — were prosecuted and found guilty of violating the law on fat content according to Burch.

• • •

Consumer investigators, Burch said, have discovered some food markets were selling what they termed "ground meat" instead of or along with "ground beef". In at least one case, the product contained pork, although the package in no way indicated the type of meat. Poulty may also be used as another additive of "ground meat", he warned, and that either pork or poultry, if not properly prepared, could be the cause of serious illnesses such as salmonella or trichinosis.

Maryland law does not place strict controls on the sale of "ground meat"; however, the General Assembly is currently looking into the problem so that the public may be protected from these dangers.

Burch warned the retail food industry that his office will regularly be on the lookout for violations of the law.

He advised consumers to demand the real thing especially in view of the price of beef and current law. "If you want beef, ask for ground beef by name and make sure that it is labeled as such. If the label says anything other than ground beef or hamburger, realize that you may be buying pork, chicken or even ground chicken gizzards," he said.
