NAACP sets up another jail unit

STORMVILLE, N.Y. — The NAACP has just organized its second prison branch here at Green Haven State Prison. Gloster B. Current, national director of branches, presented the charter at an installation banquet attended by 250 persons.

Officers of the new branch were installed by the Rev. Jerry M. Guess, regional director for the Northeast.

The first prison branch was organized some months ago at the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary in Pennsylvania with the approval of the warden and the Federal Prison Board.

Current promised inmates at Green Haven that the NAACP, through its volunteers, would work with the men on the inside to make their home communities better places to live at the time of their return.

In the meantime, he said, "a man can be what he wants to be if he only tries. We of the NAACP will do our best to help you."

Guess said the effort "grows out of the concern not to have other Attices erupt because of dehumanizing and brutalizing treatment of inmates."

He said, "such branches will work in conjunction with local civilian branches in establishing educational, cultural and recreational programs for inmates and additional efforts will be made to help secure paid employment upon release."

In addition to the prison branches, the NAACP has established a program in New York City to assist ex-offenders secure housing, employment, job training, social services and personal counselling.

Project Rebound is sponsored by mid-Manhattan branch and is the first of a series of such programs to be operated across the nation

Hugh Taylor dead at 82; prominent Springfielder

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO — Hugh Taylor, one of this town's most priminent residents, died on Tuesday after a brief illness. He was about 84.

Funeral services were held Saturday at Second Baptist Church where he held membership for 60 years. He was a deacon, trustee for over 30 years and chairman of the trustee board for 25 years. He also served as church treasurer.

Noted as a civic leader, successful contractor and businessman, Mr. Taylor in his later years spent his time as a gentleman farmer and made his home on an 82-acre farm on the Springfield-Jamestown Pike, an area where he had extensive real estate holdings.

He always expressed pride in his long service as a member of the Metropolitan Housing Authority.

In 1971, Mr. Taylor received a handsome plaque when he was named "Outstanding Contractor of the Year" at the annual national convention of Affiliated Contractors of America, Inc. held at Holiday Inn in Columbus, Ohio.

HUGH TAYLOR
Buried Saturday in Springfied, Ohio

Born in Jackson, Ohio, Mr. Taylor settled in Clark County in 1910. He worked as a farmer for 10 years before he entered the construction business. He was employed by a cement and his employer retired, he masonry contractor. When took over the business.

Mr. Taylor's visit to the AFRO office in Baltimore in October, 1971, coincided with installation of this newspaper's $40,000 photon machine. A photo of him beside the new machine was published in this newspaper.

At that time, Mr. Taylor told this reporter he found it "rewarding" to drive around the city and survey the building work he had done during nearly 50 years as cement masonry contractor.

Mr. Taylor was active in a number of other civic endeavors. For over 33 years, he served on the Center St. YMCA board of managers and was its chairman for nine years.

The board honored him with a distinguished service plaque A. P. Miss, now associate general executive of the Baltimore area YMCA, was executive at the time.

Mr Taylor was also active as trustee of the United Appeals, served on the board of the NAACP, Urban League and was a Prince Hall Mason and Elk.

In 1965, the Springfield chapter of Frontiers of America presented him the Distinguished Citizen Citation.

Mr. Taylor is survived by his wife of 50 years, Mrs. Addie Taylor; a son, David, and several grandchildren.

Jamaica official feted during Calif. visit

NEW YORK — During his recent swing through three California cities, Jamaica's Minister of Industry and Tourism, Hon. P. J. Patterson, was feted by a number of resident Jamaican and West Indian groups.

It was Patterson's first visit to California, and the first time a government official of cabinet rank has made a personal bid for "cooperative enterprise between Jamaica and the United States."

In Los Angeles, Patterson and his delegation, which included members of the Jamaica Tourist Board, the Jamaica Industrial Development Corporation and a representative of the Jamaica Development Bank, were given a reception jointly by the Jamaica Progressive League, the United Jamaican Association and the Organization of Caribbean American Peoples.

During a brief speech and question-and-answer session, Patterson received an ovation when he announced his government's new decision declaring free secondary education for all Jamaicans and free enrollment at the University of the West Indies for all academically qualified students.

In the state capital of Sacramento, the minister and his party were given an evening reception to meet California legislators, Jamaican and other West Indian residents, and friends of Jamaica.

The affair was held at the home of Jamaican Mrs. Lois Jones, administrative assistant to State Sen. Albert Song. Patterson was also presented to the California State Assembly, which he addressed.

While in San Francisco, the minister and his party were received informally by the Jamaican community after a reception-presentation sponsored by the Jamaica Tourist Board for Bay area travel executives.

Keys to the cities of Los Angeles and San Francisco were given Patterson, and he also received two welcoming resolutions from the California Senate and House of Representatives.

Coalition plans to create new political force

NEW YORK — Asserting that existing political structures have tragically failed the black community, a group of middle income people have organized the Independent Black Political Coalition, which they hope will become a powerful force.

H. Carl McCall, president of the Inner City Broadcasting Co., speaking for the group, said their first political act will be the endorsement of Assemblyman Albert H. Blumenthal as mayor.

McCall, former head of the city's Council Against Poverty, stressed that the scope of the coalition went beyond the current city-wide elections, and added that it is looking toward the 1974 statewide elections.

Between now and then, however, he said the coalition will be involved in a number of activities.

They include voter registration and education, campaigns to increase community control of local institutions, efforts to influence political appointments, and the mobilization of "those blacks traditionally alienated from local politics.

Explaining the need for the organization Carlos Russell, Dean of Brooklyn College's School of Contemporary studies said:

"It's very difficult to base change solely on organizing poor people, and we want to bring together a number of middle income blacks with managerial skills."

"It does not mean we are abandoning the poor blacks but removing some of the pressures from them."

The goals of the present coalition are similar to those of the year old New York State Black Assembly, which grew out of the 1972 National Black Political Convention.

Julius Thomas, noted NUL worker, dead at 76

NEW YORK — Funeral services were held recently for Julius A. Thomas, 76, former industrial relations director of the National Urban League and executive secretary of three Urban League affiliates, who died unexpectedly at his home in Dayton, Ohio, on May 20.

Funeral services were held in that city on May 24.

Thomas' service with the League spanned almost 40 years beginning in 1924 when he was named executive secretary of the Atlanta League.

In 1925, as its executive secretary, he organized the Jacksonville, Fla. Urban League, and in 1929 moved to a similar post at the Louisville League.

He served there until 1943 when he was appointed industrial relations director in the national office.

As Industrial Relations Director of the League, Thomas was a key figure in expanding job opportunities for black workers during and after World War Two.

His report on the performance of 250,000 black workers in 300 war plants documented their productivity, thus assuring the employment of blacks after the war.

In 1947, Thomas organized the League's Commerce and Industrial Council composed of representatives of major corporations committed to equal employment opportunity.

He also organized the League's Trade Union Advisory Council and in 1949 initiated the League's Pilot Placement Project which placed thousands of skilled black workers in industrial jobs not previously open to them.

The first recruiting visit of a major corporation to a black college campus — that of the General Electric Company to Howard University in 1949 — was arranged by Mr. Thomas and set a pattern that is regarded as commonplace today.

He also initiated the Career Conference of the League which brought over 500 industrial consultants, resource people and discussion leaders to black college campuses where they eventually reached more than 400,000 young people.

He retired from the League in 1961.

He was born in Gibson, N.C., in 1896 and grew up in Charleston, S.C. He graduated Cum Laude from Howard University in 1914 and after brief military service in World War I was employed at the Cleveland Post Office.

Thomas is survived by his widow, Constance, and a sister, Mrs. Ruth Gilmer of Charleston, West Virginia.

Awards received by Thomas include the Congressional Selective Service Award, 1947; the National Technical Association Award, 1949; the Chicago Defender Award, 1950; the Russwurm Award, 1950; Howard University's 1953 Alumni Award and the City of New York Citation for Distinguished and Exceptional Services, 1960.

He received honorary degrees from the University of Maryland, Delaware State College, Virginia State College and Howard University.

Church group challenges Exxon's plans for Angola

NEW YORK — Exxon Corporation faced considerable criticism at its 1973 stockholders' meeting for its plan to invest in Angola, a Portuguese colony in Southern Africa

The challenge was led by a coalition of eight Protestant denominations called the Church Project on U.S. Investments in Southern Africa — 1973.

A member of the project, the Unitarian Universalist had filed a stockholder resolution urging Exxon to establish a committee "to fully examine the implications for both the company and for Angola of its proposed new investment in Angola."

The church critics argued that Exxon's investment would assist Portugal, which is fighting in Angola against African movements for independence. Portugal, which is fighting in Angola against African movements for independence. Portugal has over 60,000 troops in that African territory.

Support for the resolution came from different quarters. The Ford Foundation, holder of 500,000 shares of Exxon, voted in favor of the resolution, as did Oberlin College and numerous church bodies.

Harvard University abstained on the resolution but asked management to reexamine the proposed investment moving closer attention to the struggle for independence. The resolution received 1.5 per cent of the stockholder votes cast.

• • •

The president of the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, issued a statement "strongly opposing attempts being made by Exxon Corporation to secure exploration rights for oil offshore the Portuguese colony of Angola."

Among the speakers for the resolution were Mr. Margaret Williams, for the Unitarian Universalist Association. Mustafa Sam, representative of the United Nations Office of the Organization of African Unity, Abel Cuimaraes, an Angolan living in New York, and Rev. Lawrence Henderson, speaking before a stockholder audience of over 1,000 persons, explained his opposition to Exxon's going into Angola: "At this very moment, Angolan minutemen are fighting for freedom from Portugal in the village of Angola.

"If at the simple invitation of the Portuguese government Exxon goes into Angola, the call will go out as in 1776: 'The Redcoats are coming,' or translated in 1973, 'Exxon is coming.'"

Sam, speaking for the Organization of African Unity, which represents 41 independent states, urged Exxon not to leopardize its friendship and commercial relations with the rest of African by going into Angola.

"As a responsible labor union, we recognize the rights of all workers and needs to economic justice and political self-determination. We would only hope major oil companies, Exxon included, would act in a similarly responsible manner by withdrawing any plans to invest in Portuguese colonialism in Angola."

Citing that churches are not growing rapidly in numerical sense, "they have been growing in depth," said the bishop.

"Churches have involved themselves substantially in the relief of acute human need whether occasioned by war or natural disaster — "compassion fatigue from which we were supposed to have been suffering has been largely overcome," said Bishop Mathews.

The bishop went on to cite "a changed place of women in the church, youth participation and progress in race relations as signs that the church is doing something right.

He observed that the general secretary of the World Council of Churches, the president of the National Council of Churches, the president of COCU (Consultation on Church Union), the president of the Council of Bishops of the United Methodist Church, the chairpersons of both the Baltimore and the Peninsula Conferences are all black.

Bishop Mathews calls for morals in politics

DOVER, Del. — Referring to Watergate, United Methodist Bishop James K. Mathews said, "We must insist that there is a moral basis at the root of politics in a free society" in an address titled, the Church and Our Times," at the opening session of the Peninsula Annual Conference, here in Dover.

Declaring that all problems are theological in nature, Bishop Mathews said he mentioned Watergate not merely to condemn but as a rightful concern of the people of God.

In his address, Bishop Mathews called upon Christians to look at their world, their nation and their church.

• • •

Acknowledging recent critics who had predicted the church would not survive the 1960's, the bishop said "It isn't true." In the 1960's, . . . the church once more has shown itself to be an anvil on which many a hammer has been broken."

Struggle for preservation of culture seen in Africa

EAST LANSING, Mich. — The struggle to identify and preserve a black cultural heritage isn't confined only to American blacks. It is taking place among blacks in Africa, too, says a Nigerian novelist who is completing a year's stay at Michigan State University.

Nkem Nwankwo, author of several novels and a former deputy editor of the Lgos Daily Times in Nigeria, says that just as newly independent African nations are trying to establish their political identity, so are African writers and artists seeking to establish a cultural identity.

Nwankwo is a writer-in-residence at MSU and is teaching courses in contemporary black literature.

• • •

He says that major changes in Africa over the past two decades — particularly from a long era of colonial rule to emerging self-government — is reflected in the writings of African novelists and poets.

"Most modern literature in Africa began as an attempt to counteract the notion that Africa had no culture before the white man arrived to colonize the continent," he says.

Literature before the 1960's was often militantly antiwhite, satirizing colonialism and the white man's power, Nwankwo says.

But the early sixties represented a cultural and political watershed, he adds, with more and more black African nations gaining independence.

• • •

"African literature today is no longer antiwhite, but is increasingly critical of the African leaders themselves," Nwankwo says.

• • •

Since 1958, Nwankwo notes, there has been a "literature explosion" in Africa. A classic work, "Things Fall Apart," by Nigerian writer Chinua Achebe, set the tone for writers to "recreate the African past, to give it dignity as a society before the white man came."

A dilemma facing today's African writers, he says, is dealing with the "love-hate relationship" with the language they have "inherited," such as English or French.

"They resent it as a symbol of colonial subjugation, but they recognize that for practical purposes it represents the best way of communicating with the world."

Writing in a language indigenous to a particular African nation would severely limit readership, he points out.

Nwankwo has written a number of novels, and is currently working on "Broken Images," which deals with the problems facing people torn from their cultural roots and faced with changing value systems.

The problem of separatism versus assimilation is a major one for many Africans, Nwankwo says, and he expresses the view that "while we can't turn our backs on the past, we can't afford to totally reject the technological advances taking place today."

"Ideally," he says, "we can synthesize the two and make the best use of both."

Black press directory lists media outlets

NEWARK, N.J. — The 1973 Black Press Periodical Directory, the most comprehensive listing of black media published to date, lists over 50 U.S. and 250 foreign black publications and broadcast outlets.

For the first time, all black media of interest to research, communications, advertising, and public relations organizations is covered in one complete directory.

Representing a year of work by the Black Press Clipping Bureau research staff, the directory shows close to a five million readership for the 295 black U.S. newspapers.

The periodicals (176 consumer and special interest, 35 professional and literary, and 53 association and trade) add another 2.5 million readers.

• • •

Over 250 kew foreign black media published in English are listed (133 newspapers and 123 periodicals) plus 125 stations with a black orientation.

The Black Press Periodical Directory, priced at $45, lists addresses, name of editorial contact, phone number, circulation, frequency, deadlines and has an index.

It can be ordered from the Black Press Clipping Bureau, 78 Merchant St., Newark, N.J. 07105. The telephone number is (201) 344-8545.

Founder of sickle cell group dies at age 30

PHILADELPHIA — Funeral services were held Tuesday for Donald Williams, a victim of sickle cell anemia who founded the United Sickle Cell Anemia Association. He was 30 and lived at 1518 E. Fletcher St., in Philadelphia.

Williams was employed as a laboratory technician at Jefferson Hospital where he died.

When not at his job, he was speaking to community groups about the blood disease that mostly afflicts blacks and counseling parents of children with the disease.

• • •

The association, which he founded 1968, eventually began free testing sessions to detect the presence of the sickle-shaped red blood cells.

His mother, Mrs. Thelma Williams, discovered her child had the disease when he was eight months old. Once he spent a year in the hospital. During his life, he underwent some 500 blood transfusions.

• • •

He is survived by his wife, the former Maryam Mohsin; a brother; two sisters and his maternal grandfather, Leander Williams.

Services were held at Enon Baptist Church, 19th and Green Sts.

CHANNEL 22 ANNAPOLIS

What may well be the nation's most powerful television station is expected to go on the air by the opening of the 1973-75 school year.

It will boom its signal on Channel 22 in an approximate 70-mile radius from Annapolis. And it will be a new station in Maryland's expanding public TV system.

The new facility (call letters are not as yet assigned) will be built adjacent to the Crownsville State Hospital, four miles northwest of Annapolis on State Route 178.

The Center is filing for a construction permit for a transmitter building and a transmitter tower that will radiate nearly 5 million watts. This will exceed the approximate 4 million-watt out put of Washington's WDCA-TV (channel 20), at present the country's most powerful TV station.

The Center's Annapolis transmitter, approved during the recent legislative session, will be almost five times as powerful as the state's first public TV station, WMPB, at Owings Mills. The second station, WCPB in Salisbury, operates on 750,000 watts.

The Annapolis signal is expected to carry strongly in the Baltimore metropolitan area, alleviating Channel 67 reception problems in Baltimore City.

A number of areas in the city which have not received Channel 67 well are served by Channel 73, a low cost, low powered translator which went on the air a year ago to supplement the Channel 67 signal. The activation of the Annapolis station will bring a powerful signal into Baltimore over much more level terrain to the south.

The $1.2 million Annapolis facility will carry programming from the Center in Owings Mills, and will have the capability of transmitting separate taped and filmed programs.
