Rechargeable pacemaker viewed

Two Baltimoreans, both wearers of a newly developed rechargeable cardiac pacemaker, told a panel of Johns Hopkins University scientists about the device your self recharging process.

The device, about the size of a flat cigaret lighter, is implanted beneath the chest skin and recharged weekly by the patient himself by connecting a set of wires from a small chest 'vest' into an electric outlet.

Its developers say it was designed primarily to eliminate the need for surgical operations every 18 months or two years to replace chemical batteries of conventional units.

The new device which has a rated life expectancy of about 20 years cost between $1,500 to $1,800 compared to about $1,200 for a more conventional type for which repeated surgery is required.
