
Shirley Nelson of IBM is working to make more people aware of how serious sickle cell anemia can be.

Her friends are helping.

And so is IBM.

Shirley Nelson is with IBM at Huntsville, Ala., working on a U.S. space project.

In her spare time she helps fight sickle cell anemia.

She and her friends give talks about the disease and urge people to go for tests.

But the special kits for these tests cost money. So Shirley asked IBM for help.

And we gave it, from the IBM Fund For Community Service. It helps IBM employees aid their communities by providing funds for community projects.

The sickle cell anemia campaign in Huntsville has been a great success.

Thanks to people like Shirley. And local medical people who gave their time.

We're proud that so many of our employees want to help their communities.

The IBM Fund For Community Service is one way we help them do it. IBM