dents an option and a feeling of having self worth."

Under the new program, a student will "sign a contract" for a certain amount of work which he will complete at his own pace (to insure retention and de-emphasize grades).

The instructor, explains Mrs. Woodland, will serve only to assist the progress of individual students.

"Under the contract system kids will only 'buy what they can afford'", she says, adding "sure, some kids will do a 'rip-off' but we'll go along with it. We don't lose a child until we lose him from school."

Julia Woodland became Dunbar school principal in August 1973. She theorized both then and now that a school's offerings determine whether a student comes or goes.

She admits now, however, that the new Dunbar makes this theory a bit easier to practice.

"We're trying something a little bit different. Even if a student comes in once a week, we'll make it interesting enough so eventually he'll come the other four days, too," she says.

And this is where the school's structure enters into the picture.

The school is designed so that the academic area is located in the center of the building on the third floor. It is flanked by the conservatively decorated industrial area on the east wing and the more daringly designed fine arts and physical education area on the west.

In years past, a student's "homeroom" would be either an impersonal auditorium or a drab and usually cramped classroom. Not so at the new Dunbar.

Each group of ninth, tenth, eleventh and twelfth graders will be assigned to one of four color coded "houses". It is here that students will meet for home room and eat lunch. (each "house" is equipped with its own cafeteria, advisor and director's office).

"And if students want to change house because of a personality clash," says Mrs. Woodland, "they may do so, some people just don't get along," she adds with a laugh.

"It is definitely a community school," says architect Donkervoet and also a very complex one:

"Its form is an outgrowth of the functions contained therein, he adds. "Some areas had to be isolated and secured from the public while other areas had to be accessible to the public and still others had to be accessible to both."

The ultra modern auditorium is one such area, and Donkervoet admits that if he had to pick the most unique feature of the building, "this would be it."

"I think it's the best in Baltimore city," he enthuses.

The multi purpose auditorium has a seating capacity of 800 for regular stage shows. When being used as a theatre the capacity reduces to 500 in order to insure viewing comfort.

A symphony orchestra and a jazz quintet have already performed in the auditorium, and according to Mr. Donkervoet, "the stage is large enough to put on a Broadway play."

But the auditorium is more than a pretty piece of work, says Mrs. Woodland.

The students who operate the auditorium have been in class since May learning how to do just that.

"Do you know how much theatre technicians make an hour?" she asks. "Thirty dollars; that's what I'm shooting at for these kids."

However, the school's strength is health careers, and a tour through that portion of the building all but explains why.

"This is our drawing card," says Mrs. Woodland, proudly pointing to an elaborate dental lab.

"We have an arrangement with Johns Hopkins University where they will send pediatricians, dentists and doctors to demonstrate various clinic techniques."

According to the school principal the dental lab will be open to the public at either a nominal fee or free of charge.

Students enrolled in the health careers porgram will work as aides in participating clinics on a work study basis. This, explains Mr. Woodland, is part of the schools effort to "give students something concrete."

An olympic sized pool, a spacious gymnasium, fivecent ink pen dispensers, carpeted student lounges and a ground floor full of community services are all part of the new Dunbar experience in East Baltimore.

But there's one problem. A problem which could very well cause irreparable programatic damage to the school before it ever gets going.

The school is designed to hold 1,600 students. According to student projection figures, some 2,500 students have indicated a preference to attend the school.

"My biggest concern is overcrowding," admits Mrs. Woodland. "that would kill the program. Anything else, I can deal with."

Concerned black citizens tell them to the Mayor

Representatives of the Concerned Black Citizens met Monday with Baltimore City Mayor Schaefer at City Hall.

Dr. Oakley Saunders and Mrs. Grace Hines, co-chairpersons, speaking for the group said:

"Black citizens of Baltimore are gravely concerned about the negligence of, indifference to, and insult to the black community perpetuated by the city officials."

Specifically they charged the Mayor and President of the City Council, as, 'displaying serious disregard to the city's black population."

In a prepared statement, the organization noted it, "interest in the betterment and growth of Baltimore," which they said can not come about "until the government conscientiously recognizes its black citizenry and utilizes its skills, expertise and knowledge of all its citizens."

During the forty-five minute conference with the Mayor in the Board of Estimates Room, (strike negotiators were in his office), representatives of the group composed of citizens and elected officials, criticized educational policies of the Shaefer administration.

They claimed it has "lost perspective" in establishing priority in matters of allocating additional funds, "thus denying black youth an opportunity for excellence in education, particularly since the school system is 70 per cent black."

The recent audit of the Baltimore school budget was called "a concerted effort" by the president of the City Council (Orlinsky) to attempt to discredit Dr. Roland N. Patterson, the city's first black superintendent.

The group's 8-page position paper made specific reference to "blatent insults" to the community including dismissal of representatives, from positions on boards and commissions, denial of appropriations by the Board of Estimates for a city school principal to participate in an educational conference.

In addition, the group expressed "dismay" that all Baltimore city boards and commission and committee of Baltimore City have only token black representation, despite the fact that the city is 53 per cent black.

The report noted that on 45 boards, commissions and committees with 432 members, of which the Mayor appoints, 320 personal) only 74 black members are serving.

Further, the citizens' group charged "a disgrace" that almost $64,000 of taxpayers money is paid to members serving on salaried boards, yet of this amount only $14,000 is received by black representatives.

Recommendations to the Mayor included requests that:

1. All boards, commissions and committees be composed of members equal to the population representation.

2. Black board members be designated as chairmen or president of some boards of adequately reflect the percentage of population such as the fire, municipal and zoning boards and others.

3. Specifically boards and commissions on salaried basis reflect the black population, and

4. A variety of black and white citizens be appointed to serve on various boards, committees and commissions to afford a broad and unblased representation of the ethnic and economic
