Minority career weekend slated for July 26-27

A career weekend for professional minority job candidates will be held July 26-27 at the Baltimore Hilton Hotel.

Th weekend, which is expected to draw up to 150 minority applicants, is sponsored by The Minority Group, a professional employment service from Springfield, Mass., and is one of several regional weekends organized by it.

During the weekend leading firms interview entry level and upper management candidates in such areas as engineering, data processing, accounting, marketing, sales, manufacturing and administration. There is no charge for candidates to attend the weekend. They need only submit a resume to The Minority Group prior to the weekend session.

The Career Weekend concept has helped make it possible for qualified minority candidates to achieve visibility with leading firms around the country and at the same time it has assisted these firms in finding the minority professionals they so vitally need.

Goodwill needs utensils

Baltimore Goodwill Industries is critically short of pots, pans, dishes, eating utensils and bric-a-brac, according to Harvey E. Kettering, executive director, who has appealed for donations of such house ware items.

Donated materials provide work for handicapped employees of Goodwill, both the main headquaters where the items are restored and in Goodwill Thrift Stores.

Mr. Kettering asked the houseware items be taken to one of several Goodwill Attended Collection Centers, where receipts are given, or that a request for a truck pickup at your home be made by calling 247-311.

Commission honors Mr. Berry

The Baltimore City Planning Commission honored former commission, John L. Berry, Thursday. A plaque was presented in recognition of Mr. Berry's 10 years of service on the commission.

Mr. Berry could not attend the meeting because of an allergy.

The commemorative plaque reads:

"The Baltimore City Planning Commission proudly presents this plaque to John L. Berry in recognition and appreciation of long, distinguished, dedicated and faithful service to this commission from November 19, 1964 to August 16, 1963. Mr. Berry steadfastly carried out his manifold responsibilities, making significant contributions of lasting value and importance to social justice and planning in Baltimore."

Reading project pays off for students, parents

By Bill Rhoden

School No. 61 may have finally done it.

After years of experimental reading programs it appears as if the summer staff at John Eager Howard Elementary School has developed a system that both students and parents can get into.

Headed by (summer) principal Joseph Taylor, (REAL (reading, expression, arts, laboratory) serves some 6,000 kindergarten through fourth grade students each of whom has enrolled on a volunteer basis.

The program is unique, explains Mr. Taylor because of its testing and monitoring system which allows the student to follow his progress and channel his energies into those areas where he is most deficient.

When students first enroll in the program they are given a basic Criterion Assessment Test to determine their reading needs.

Each student is then listed (horizontally) on a large chart along with each tested area (listed vertically). As sub tests are given a student receives either a plus or minus under each respective area.

This, of course, enables students to see what their strengths and weaknesses are in a given area. It also enables teachers to chart a student's progress throughout the course.

* * *

"We've been teaching them (students) what they already know and they've been turning us off," says reading instructor Mrs. Annette Hall.

"The chart enables students to see what they need," she continues "and I think the students like knowing what they don't know."

* * *

And according to Mr. Taylor, the students know quite a bit.

"The average inner-city kid walks in here with 500 to 700 hours of television viewing, so he's already learned a lot when he comes here."

* * *

Another unique aspect of the program is the rapport between parents and teachers.

The most recent (and unfortunate) trend in inner city education is for the academic education of a student to end in a classroom.

In most cases, parents do not involve themselves in their childs classroom activities. Consequently, when the child brings home (or fails to bring home) assignments or problems . . . the parents, being unfamiliar with the work or with the child's progress, cannot react.

"What were doing here is involving parents in the classroom," says Mrs. Florence Griffin, the schools parent-school liaison.

"We bring them in the classroom and they help the students with their reading and math in addition to assisting the teacher and the teacher's aide.

* * *

And it looks as if parents are making a difference in the school. Now that they have first hand knowledge of their child's "plusses and minuses" the parents are better able to work with instructors and make the educational reading process a 24-hour affair.

But reading (per se) is only one component of the program.

Students are required to assess what is read as well as apply it to different situations and syntactically analyze it. More important, however is the fact that students are being taught at an early age to to work alone and evaluate themselves independently.

According to reading specialist Ms. Mary Lewis, all a students needs is "to be pointed in the right direction", and he will perform with a minimum of supervision.

"All of this (pointing to reading equipment in the school's High Intensity Laboratory) is geared toward self directed work for each pupil," she says.

Ms. Lewis says that a student, after looking at the performance chart and determining his deficiencies, will come to the laboratory and go to the area which specializes in that deficiency.

"After the student finds the area, he or she will look within that area for additional materials." Ms. Lewis notes, adding that at this point "the student will get involved in the material independently."

* * *

But perhaps the most exceptional part of the program is its 23-member staff, (11 professionals, 10 paraprofessionals, one program assistant and one program manager, i.e., principal).

* * *

During the regular school year—Mr. Taylor serves as principal of Forest Park High School, but his brief fling with the elementary reading program has made him think twice about the future.

"The world's only as big as your mind," he says. "I like secondary education but being involved in this program has made me more aware of teachers and what they have to go through."

The 31-year-old principal smiled and added: "With ample time I think I could become quite proficient in this area."
