The new game of tag

If you and your car have gotten attached to those old blue-and-white license plates, it's time to get out the hacksaw. The romance is over.

The first five-year cycle of that noble experiment is ended, and although you may feel otherwise when you're battling the five-year-old rust on the bolts, it was a resounding success.

It has already saved the state $5.5 million compared with making and mailing the metal plates every year (the stickers cost next to nothing). And for those skeptics in the legislature who wondered whether the material would hold up that long, the failure rate was well under 1 per cent — a little higher on the salty Eastern Shore.

When the new five-year plate debuts in March, it will be all different.

Instead of white on blue, it will be red on white. Instead of having two letters and four numbers, it will have three letters and three numbers. But here's something you don't hear very often: it won't cost any more than the old ones.

The reason for the new format is simple. If the state had stayed with the old AA-1234 format, it would have run out of combinations soon. (They're already up to the S's.) The new arrangement allows three times as many combinations — about 12 million, they figure — which ought to last a little while, though it may not look it on a summer weekend near the Bay Bridge.

With the whole alphabet to choose from, the first batch ordered from the House of Correction, 1.9 million of them fo all the expected registrations this spring, runs only from AAA-001 through EDZ-999. In other words, there's quite a bit of reserve power when the auto industry gets back on the track.

The potential number is limited, though, by the deletion of what MVA Commissioner Ejner J. Johnson calls "offensive combinations." Some of them are pretty obvious. Others, he said, are a matter of judgment.

So in the first batch ordered, there is no APE, and a bit down the list it skips from ASR to AST. BAD is good, but there's no BAG. Apparently somebody felt that might cast aspersions on the driver. And further down, it skips again — from BVC to BVE. "That's a trade name anyway," Johnson explained.

In every procedure there are exceptions, and the Maryland license tag scheme is no exception.

The law mandates special tags for the American Legion (AL), the DAV and VFW, Volunteer fireman and handicapped persons get emblems. And there's a lot more, too — in fact the state makes 39 different types of specialized tags.

If you see a tag starting with LCA or RIG, you ought to know the owner is a Lion or a Rotarian. The Shriners get BBV through BBZ, the Elks the BEM through BEZ, the Knights of Columbus KCA through KCS, and even the Free State Square Club, all 14,000 of them, get EEA through EER.

As in the past, the state allows large organizations to reserve their own blocs, as long as they coordinate the ordering and distribution themselves. Ordinarily, this requires membership in the thousands, with the lone exception of the small but persistent Maryland Press Club — the same bunch that once honored Spiro Agnew as the Man of the Year — which will get distinctive and exclusive MPA and MPB plates.

Incidentally, those personalized plates will stay on the market for $25 extra. They've never quite reached the hotcake category — only about 9,000 — but they're ideal for people who always wanted to see their names in print, or who can remember their initials if not their tag numbers.

Once again, the Motor Vehicle Administration keeps an eagle eye peeled. As Johnson said, "License plates are supposed to identify vehicles, not entertain or advertise." But while the law intended these to be name plates, MVA allows a refuse collector to carry a tag TRASH, or a swimming pool dealer to show POOLS.

And they even allow pure frivolity, like HO-HOHO and BYEBYE. But Johnson doesn't want to get into the same boat as his counterpart in Oregon, who three years ago let the French version of a common American vulgarism get by and hasn't heard the end of it yet.

That's why they turned down the request of a young lady not long ago. She appealed, arguing to the effect that offensiveness is in the eye of the beholder. She finally got her plates: IDIDIT.

Although the new plates are targeted for five years, it may be a good idea not to get too attached. The legislature will get a bill establishing a special tag for the bicentennial — probably reflectorized red, white, and blue — as an extra-cost option.

Even in the license tag game, you can pay your money and take your choice.
