d for Higher Education. Remaining on the board will be Dr. James Priest, Councilman Thomas Waxter, Judge Robert Watts, Del. Larry Young and city official Quienten Lawson.

The mass resignations came late Tuesday during a stormy board meeting where board members voted to file an appeal with the State Board for Higher Education to reconsider its July 6 decision to withdraw approval for the school to operate.

The appeal was formally sent to state board officials Wednesday along with a guarantee that the school's financial records would be open to state auditors.

According to board sources, the discussion of the shcool's shaky future was a little less than friendly and that Kaplan finally declared "I can't work with them (the school administration) anymore."

Charles P. Howard, the acting president of the school, was said to have replied "I don't give a damn."

Judge Robert Watts attempted to keep peace in the meeting by telling the members "if there is an ounce of cure left that can keep Bay's doors open let's use it."

Kaplan and Watts could not be reached for comment and Howard refused to discuss any matters concerning Bay.

The reason for the resignations, it was reported, was because the five members believe nothing more could be done to help the financially plagued junior college.

Attempts were made to get the other five members to resign but they decided to remain with "the best interest of the school at heart."

The Tuesday meeting had been called by the board members to reconsider a vote taken last week to file the appeal with the state board and to order Howard to open the books for the state auditors.

Howard, on two occasions, had refused to turn over the books to the auditors citing that graduation and bad timing as the reasons for him not opening the books to the auditors. He did however, open the books Thursday.

Howard refused to discuss the situation with the AFRO but sources contend that Howard did not turn over the books because of possible financial misappropriations "during the last two administrations and severl conflicts of interest between certain board members and the administration."

The audit is to examine Bay's use of about $415,000 in state grant funds over the past two years.

It was requested by Sheldon H. Knorr, state board commission, who noted federal officials had found misuse of federal student aid funds at the school.

"Your record in the Attorney General's Office indicate that you will be a fair, impartial advocate.

"It is our privilege to endorse a candidate with such principles and dedication."

People you should know

By Tracy Potts

"I figure," says the recently promoted Lieutenant of Walter Reed Army Medical Center's civilian guard force, Marshall Hicks, "that the more education our force has as a group, the better they'll be able to handle more difficult situations.

Hicks, whose official title is senior guard supervisor, is practicing what he preaches by pursuing an undergraduate degree at American University. Ultimately, he aspires to a doctorate and a teaching job in law enforcement at some major university.

Why have civilian guards at all on a military post? Hicks responds, "First of all, there's a need for manpower for physical security. The MPs are short on people.

"Our main concern is with the security of the hospital, and most of our men are men deployed there. On each shift, he says, 11 different posts are manned by the guards, who are empowered to carry out regulations in the new hospital, and to protect people and property.

"We also want to promote good human relations with people and provide a safe, courteous atmosphere for people who work here."

Many of the civilian guards on post have worn the uniform themselves. "We've got roughly 200 years of military experience on the force."

Hicks himself spent just under 11 years in the Army, three and a half of those years in Vietnam, and came out of the Army a sergeant first class. "One thing good about being in the military," he says of his men's combined years, "is knowing the significance and importance of rank; in not saying 'hey you' to a colonel."

One new task the civilian guards may be taking on soon will be giving out D.C. parking tickets. "It's just a matter of time," Hicks reported.

Asked what official powers his team has, Hicks replied that civilian guards have the power of detention. "We can detain someone until the Fourth District, D.C. Metropolitan Police get here. We can also conduct a frisk-type search if we suspect that person has a weapon.

"We are guards, not police. We don't have police power. But all this is just playing with words, because when you detain a person you're stopping them from doing what they want to do."

He says that he is going to push for his people to attend courses in sociology. "You've got a large variety of people here — mental patients, people berereved, people who've just been told they can't have children.

"And in the more education our men have, the better they'll be able to handle stressful situations. We are trying to make this a highly professionalized force.

Why do they carry a gun? Says Hicks, "The only reason you use a weapon is to be able to counter force equalize the same force. We just try to use 'show of force,' and we use the sidearm when all other measures have been exhausted and there's no other choice. We're well trained, and trained to hit our mark, and we'll only fire to protect other people's lives."

Let's Talk About Beauticians

BY INEZ SHORTER

It might be wise for the small beauty shop owners to take a good look at the situation they are gradually slipping into. The department stores and elite downtown beauty businesses are gradually crowding in on them and if they are not careful they will soon be a thing of the past.

Madam just loves to visit the more elite shops and brings back stories of it costs. This is not funny because they usually get half the service given in the small shops.

Let's face it. Everybody loves to be pampered and every one likes beautiful surroundings. So, take a good look at the situation.

Small shop owners should spend more time attending beauty shows, demonstrations, and meetings pertaining to the beauty business. Most are free and offer an abundance of helpful information. Ask your beauty supplier to keep you informed of the dates of these affairs.

Small shop owners should spend a little more time making their shops attractive. It is surprising at the amount of "do - it - yourself" work that can be done between customers, such as painting, decorating, etc.

I nicknamed my shop "The Little Hole In the Wall." I am going to redecorate and change the name to "Little Paradise." Remember it's the little things that count, and our customers just love a beautiful, ultra - clean shop. So come on fellow beauticians, let's stop shirking and start working at it. Small Shops can be attractive, too.

Arlene Jefferson, national chairperson for the Youth For Beauty Division of the National Beauty Culturists' League, Inc., is organizing a youth educational committee and is asking beauticians to volunteer their services for various capacities of leadership.

Minnie Ervin, one of the hard working youth presidents in North Carolina, will chair this important committee.

Jefferson is planning to have workshops, hair-styling contests, business sessions, and other interesting programs for young people. She will use the NBCL Institute in Washington as the focal point.

Among the activities scheduled for young people at the NBCL National Convention is the Annual Youth For Beauty Breakfast and the Better Speakers' Contest. The subject of the contest is "Youth Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow." Jefferson is trying to make this a banner year for youth.

Ertha McCain is NBCL youth chairperson for the District of Columbia. Anyone wishing more information may contact her through the National Beauty Culturists' League, Inc., 25 Logan Circle, N.W.

During the lunch, Basileus Wilson thanked the sorors in the youth department of the chapter for their participation in the baby contest sponsored by the chapter. The affair was held at the National Home and proceeds benefited the chapter's Scholarship Fund. Julia Butler served as chairperson of the affair, and Maxiora Wills presented the winning baby.

The NBCL junior board of trustees presented a disco and supper dance in the main ballroom of the Burlington Hotel.

Committee members of the affair were Mable Pittman, Hattie Mullins, Josie Green, Margaret Phifer, Louise Scott, Ertha McCain and Constance Smith. Ada Palmer is chairperson of the Junior Trustee Board.
