Islam will not trade heritage for Western aid

By David D. Pearce

The dilemma of the Islamic peoples vis-a-vis the West is that, although they crave western technology, they detest much of western culture and its vaules.

Islamic scholars argue that Islam is not retrograde, but rather a refined form of civilization with firm roots in sciences such as chemistry, medicine, mathematics, navigation and astronomy, which originated in the Moslem world and have since been "borrowed" by the West.

"We must not re-import corrupt versions of our sciences," says Sheikh Mahmoud Abu Obayeh, representative in Lebanon of Cairo's 1,000-year-old Al Azhas University. "The West used chemistry to make whiskey and we must shun this."

Industrialization, he said, must be accomplished selectively. "We must choose what is suitable for us and reject what is harmful."

The establishment of factories is a case in point, he argued.

"When we set up a clothing vactory, we must make sure it does not produce the mini-or micro-skirts that have corrupted the West and shed women's dignity and respectability."

Lebanon's Sheikh Abdel Aziz Salameh agreed.

"Television is a useful invention of the industrialized West," he said. "But westerners have turned it into the home of the devil with all these films of crime, sex and immorality.

"We have mimicked the West in many ways. I maintain that television should be used for purposes more in keeping tradition."

The resurgence of Islam and Islamic values among the 600 to 800 million moslems of Africa, the Middle East and Asia has been reflected in a return to fundamentals and Islamic orthodoxy from the shoulder of Africa to Malaysia.

For this great collection of people, the Koran is what mean little red book was for China.

Islam, or submission to God, is not only a religion but a social order.

Like Judaism, Islam has laws that closely govern all aspects of the organization of human society, down to what a Moslem may or may not eat and how the food is prepared.

Like Jews, Moslems may not eat pork at all and strict dietary laws are prescribed for the preparation of chicken, lamb, beef and camel.

The Islamic laws, or sharia, are severe. A convicted thief may have his hand chopped off, adulterers are stoned to death and decapitations is the penalty for rape or murder — though there are strict requirements for convictions for such offenses.

In Saudi Arabia, two Britons recently were flogged in public for selling liquor. Moslems receive the same penalty for drunkenness.

But the sharia is inspired by the Koran and as such is gaining in popularity throughout the Islamic world as a result of the current fundamentalist resurgence. With this resurgence has also come an upsurge of anti-westernism.

It has been difficult for many westerners to believe that anti-western sentiment can exist without the aid of Communism.

This stems from the deep western sense of benefits western ideas have brought to the Third World. In the United States, this is typified by gripes about giving other nations foreign aid only to have them "spit in our face."

But anti-western feeling in the Islamic world is a complex phenomenon.

It mixes resentment of colonial rule and economic domination with the desire to acquire things that make the West strong, such as technology and weapons, and the concurrent fear that acquisition of those western methods and products will destroy ancient values, faith and traditions.

With this attraction-repulsion relationship there is usually a passionate determination to maintain national independence.

And throughout the Islamic world, people are finding their religion an effective channel for asserting national identify in the face of godless Communism and what they see as corrupt and alien western culture.
