Labor Secretary at UDC lauds inflation policies

In a speech aimed at supporting the White House's inflation policies, Secretary of Labor F. Ray Marshall told a graduating class of 1,275 at the University of the District of Columbia Saturday, that the Carter Administration would work to achieve the aims of the 30-year - Hawkins Full Employment Act as a way of achieving economic recovery.

Previous administrations, Marshall said, sought to fight inflation by keeping a planned unemployment level of about 6 percent, which in turn had a disastrous effect on the economy. Under the Humphrey - Hawkins plan, which Marshall called the "largest economic recovery program since the New Deal," unemployment could be brought down to zero.

Marshall said that in an attempt to find jobs for all poor persons who want them, and all do, he said, companies and businesses might be offered direct benefits or tax subsidies for hiring minorities.

Before coming to Labor Department, Marshall was director of the Center for the Study of Human Resources at the University of Texas at Austin. He has authored or co-authored several books on economics and labor. Marshall is a native of Louisiana where he attended Louisiana State University. He received his undergraduate degree from Millsaps College in Jackson, Miss., and earned a doctorate in economics from the University of California at Berkeley.

Although blacks have been given many more opportunities to be employed and promoted since Carter took office, inflation according to Marshall is cutting into indemnire programs for poor and minorities.

They are "least able to change their buying habits or increase their income," he said.
