Dishonesty can be blamed for as much as 15 percent of the price of goods in a supermarket. Employee theft is termed a bigger problem than shoplifting, amounting to about 1 percent of total sales. The theft of 25 cents worth of bananas requires $25 in sales to offset the loss.

"I guess it pays to have a tattletale in the family," said Diggs' mother, Sherry Green, who is also the sister of Roland Green. "I always told Deke not to talk to strangers, and as soon as he saw Latreace go off with that man he ran into the house and told us."

As reporters talked with the mothers of both Diggs and Latreace, the children romped and played around the living room of Green's mother's residence.

"They are the closest cousins in the family," said Deke's 21 - year - old mother, "they grew up together and everything."

Latreace was handed to Charlene Mack, 21, of the 1600 block of Lexington St., as she walked with several of her friends in the 2000 block of Hollins St. approximately 14 blocks from the scene of the abduction.

"He was walking with her like a normal father and child," said Ms. Mack. "They seemed like they knew each other."

The man asked Ms. Mack and her friends to take the child to Baltimore Street, stating "she was lost."

When Ms. Mack, accompanied by the man, approached a friend in the 1800 block of W. Baltimore St., the friend recognized Latreace as the kidnapped child whose picture had been widely circulated in the media. When she gave a shout of recognition, according to Ms. Mack, the man turned and fled, leaving the child behind.

Ms. Mack says that she left the child with her friend and began chasing the suspect.

"I ran after him, but he turned south on Fulton Avenue and disappeared."

Ms. Mack received a $500 reward from a local television station, for delivering the child to the police department.

When asked what she plans to do with the reward money, Ms. Mack's mother blurted out, "she's gonna buy a new color TV!" Ms. Mack nodded her head in agreement. She says she doesn't feel like a heroine, stating modestly, "I just feel like myself."

Latreace's grandfather, William Butler, a local record producer, had offered a matching $500 reward, but has declined to pay it. According to his daughter, Wanda Green, he has hired a private investigating firm to solve the case.

The family is still uncertain as to the motive for the kidnapping, but Ms. Green offered several possible reasons.

She explained that her father's fame as a recording figure may have prompted someone to abduct and ransom her child, expecting a large sum of money from him.

There was also some initial speculation that a former boyfriend of Ms. Green is upset over her marriage to Roland Green, may have been responsible for the crime. She stated he still held feelings of resentment toward her and her husband.

However, when questioned by police, the man produced a confirmed alibi, stating he was with a relative at the time of the kidnapping.

The family still lives in fear that the suspect may be lurking in the immediate vicinity. Mrs. Green's sister - in - law Sherry told reporters that "She won't even let me take Latreace to the City Fair."

Ms. Green is afraid that the kidnapper may be someone familiar to the family.

"It has to be someone she knows," she said apprehensively, "because Latreace just doesn't come to strangers."

Young Deke stated that Latreace approached the kidnapper as if she knew him, and that she didn't make a sound when she was spirited away from the steps where they were playing.

Police are still investigating the case

Norm Reeves is big winner in 5th District

By Pattie Hodges
AFRO Staff Writer

Tuesday evening, Sept. 11 was "Victory Night" for Norman V. A. Reeves, Democratic candidate for the City Council, 5th District.

At the Reeves campaign headquarters in the 4300 block of Liberty Heights Ave., a sizeable, excited group of Reeves' campaign workers, family, friends and supporters gathered. They seemed to sense the imminence of Norm's victory before he did.

The jovial, optimistic group jammed the three headquarter's rooms and spilled out onto the lawn — feasting on sumptuous soul food and delicious drinks, chatting animatedly and joking. The general mood seemed to be: "Norm's won it."

Reeves, who was ensconced in the back room of his headquarters with campaign manager Art Murphy, and other workers was relaxed and jovial too, watching the election results on T.V. and kibitzing with friends.

However, when tapped on his sentiments about the election returns from time to time his feelings ran from "cautious" to "cautiously optimistic."

Even when Murphy, who was keeping a diligent watch and giving toroughly detailed, updated reports on precinct voting totals, (both through telephone and television use), stated that Norm was in the lead, the candidate was still keeping a cool and cautious outlook.

The crowd was widly enthusiastic when at one point the reading ran: Reeves - Waxter - Spector - Robinson - Banks, and began yelling "Yeh! Yeh! We're Number ONE." Noram was still saying, "I'm cautiously optimistic."

However, between 10 and 10:30 p.m., with most prceinct counts in, his supporters wildly jubilant, Norm grinned and broke out his cigar, while his hostesses broke out the champagne. It was in the bag.

Many folks stopped by present victory and the turning point in his campaign that led to it to the folks who stuck by him. He considers his win a victory for them as well as for him.

In Norm's words: "A campaign is a difficult thing. But with folks like L've had working with me, it's been great. This should have happened four years ago, but now that it has, it's a great feeling. I can't thank you enough."

So for Norman V.A. Reeves, the diligence and persistence of eight years has paid off. Even the fiasco of four years ago, when a name's - the - some candidate was placed on the ballot, thereby robbing him of victory in that election, fades into the background now. Norm Reeves is a fighter. And a winner.

The new councilman resides in the 3700 block of Winterbourne Road with his wife, Iris, and his two children, Norman Jr. and Traci.

'Cross over the Crosse' is Republican's theme

Although Lewin United Methodist Church was dark and quiet election night its pastor the Rev. St. George Crosse still had reason to celebrate.

The Rev. Crosse hearing that he was well end in his bid as GOP candidate for comptroller, closed his campaign headquarters around 8:30 p.m. to join the Republicans at a victory party at the Belair Road headquarters.

Crosse won with a total of 3,013 votes, more than twice the votes Ms. Joyce Romaine Gamble, his Republican opponent. She received 1,480 votes.

Crosse, 39, is not yet the comptroller. He faces formidable opposition from Hyman A. Pressman, the Democratic candidate, who won in the primary. Crosse says he still feels good about winning the Republican ticket and is "convinced" he will win the November election.

He spent all day Tuesday n the area of his headquarters working for John Douglass, Democratic for the same seat Crosse seeks. "I knew there were only 20 Republicans in my precinct so I spent most of my day helping the new voters and telling them to vote for Douglass."

After hearing that he had won the Republican side, he said "It is now time to cross over to Crosse because I will be tne new city comptroller in November."

Arena Players, Inc. 27th Season of continuous service to the Baltimore community starts Sept. 27.

to congratulate Norm. Among them were: Steve Sachs, attorney general; Marie Henderson, personnel director for Baltimore County government; Jeannette Braverman, treasurer of the NBC Five; Barry Silverman; Paul Vance, superintendent of Montgomery County Schools, Simon Carter, Larry Gibson, Ted Rosenberg, president of the NBC Five and Delegate Walter Dean, who had been on the scene for a quite a while.
