—McCown firing

The attorney says the recent riots in Miami occurred because people have lost faith in the system. He explained, "Right now we are trying to develop public support for bill 194 for a civilian review board. We will bring to the attention of the public every instance of police brutality and will be involved in the handling and processing of the complaints."

As chairman of the legal defense committee, Singleton says, "Now that (the) McGee case is behind the department, we are going to invite Pomerleau to come speak with us."

McCown was told about his termination at 11 a.m. June 25. He turned in his badge and gun last week following the board's recommendation. He testified that he thought McGee and a friend were preparing to rob the store when he fired.

Tom Bollinger, McCown's attorney, said he will appeal the case in city court. Officers were hesitant about discussing Pomerleau's decision with the AFRO.

One Northwestern district officer, who refused to give his name stated he believes McCown made a mistake and should not have been fired. Another officer, assigned to Central District said he had no comment about the case.

However, a sergeant with the department stated as a general rule in the department, officers are not suppose to talk with the media. He said, "If we are approached by the media, we are to refer them to public information."

The sergeant says it is sad that McCown was fired but the department did not have a choice after firing a black officer, Leotold Saunders for hitting a white man with his nightstick in Memorial Stadium following a World Series game last year.

seagoing parade, bands and fireworks.

Lori Kranz, a spokesman for Harborplace Limited partnership, said about 90 percent of the businesses will be ready for the opening.

There will be a few shops and restaurants that will not open, but most are about ready," she said. "It's just a matter of getting everything in place."

Credit union OK'd

The City Council has approved a $10 million industrial development bond issue for the municipal employees credit union, but also voted to investigate the project to build a new office for the union.

The proposed 11-story office building will be built by developers and leased by the credit union, which is a savings and lending institution for city government employees.

The union would buy the building when tax breaks for the developers end.
