Jean Seberg: 'A cinderella story gone sour'

A probing look at the life of Jean Seberg is presented by Correspondent Mike Wallace in the first of a new CBS News special series of biographical inquiries "The Mike Wallace Profiles," premiering Tuesday, Nov. 17 on the CBS Television Network.

"The story of Jean Sebrg is a Cinderella story gone sour," reports Wallace as he unravels the life of the all-American girl who became an international personality at age 18, the subject of an FBI probe at 30, and a suicide at the age of 40.

Jean Seberg was chosen over 18,000 others in a worldwide talent hunt in 1958 to star in director Otto Preminger's film "Saint Joan." Although that film and her next one, "Bonjour Tristesse," were critical failures, Seberg bounced back with an international hit called "Breathless." By the age of 30, she had married, divorced, married again and had moved to Hollywood, where she had achieved celebrity status, co-starring with such leading men as Warren Beatty, Sean Connery, Lee Marvin and Clint Eastwood.

In 1968, Seberg poured money into a Montessori school project in Los Angeles organized by Black Nationalist Hakim Jamal. Then, she shifted her support to another civil rights group, the Black Panthers, contributing a reported $150,000 to the Panthers.

Jean Seberg was pursued by the FBI as a Black Panther sympathizer.

In June of 1969, the FBI began what it called "an active, discreet investigation" of Jean Seberg.

An FBI-inspired story that Seberg's pregnancy in 1970 was caused by a black activist was carried by the press, and, according to friends, was the reason her baby was born prematurely. The baby died within days. Elaine Brown, once referred to as the "queen of the Black Panthers," talks for the first time publicly about Seberg, telling Wallace what was really behind the pregnancy story, based in large part on a tapped telephone conversation between Jean Seberg in Paris, and Brown and Panther Raymond Hewittt in Berkeley, Calif.

Jean Seberg, emotionally disturbed and psychologically broken by her baby's death and false press reports, took her own life in August 1979 at age 40.

The Jean Seberg "Profile" includes unique film material: an exclusive interview with Seberg's parents, who have never talked publicly about their daughter until now; her original screen test for "Saint Joan,"; her 1958 interview with Mike Wallace; appearances on "The Ed Sullivan Show" and "Person to Person," and interviews with Preminger, former Black Panther chief Bob Seale and first husband Francois Moreuil.

Women's landmark to be rededicated

The Mary McLeod Bethune Memorial Museum and the National Archives for Black Women's History, institutions of the National Council of Negro Women, will celebrate the rededication of 1318 Vermont Ave., N.W., on Nov. 8 from 3 - 7 p.m.

This important historic landmark, once served as the NCNW national headquarters and the official Washington, DC residence of Mary McLeod Bethune, the renown educator and founder of the NCNW.

The rededication ceremony will be highlighted by the opening of a special exhibition, "NCNW 1935 - 1980." This event repesents the culmination of the first phase of plans to completely restore the Second Empire Victorian structure and the first phase of a larger project to document, "The History of Black Women's Organizations, 1800 - 1980."

Restoration of this site was supported by the National Council of Negro Women with assistance from the Department of the Interior and the District of Columbia Department of Housing and Community Development.

Attendance at the exhibition opening is by invitation. The exhibition will be open to the public Nov. 9, through September 1, 1982.
