Any way you look at it, Reagan budget cripples

By Anthony Powell

You need a PH.D in economics to understand the 1983 budget proposed by the Reagan Administration. Most lay people can't understand the charts and figures they used in the preparations.

To the lay person, all we know is that defense spending will go up and more cuts will be made in social programs. Let's look at the budget more closely:

In the 1983 budget, there will be the largest defense budget in peace time. The Pentagon will receive a $33.1 billion spending increase and America isn't in a state of war.

Why? Because the Administration is determined to keep up with the Russians in the arms buildup. If the Russians build two ships, the Administration feels that we must build three. In the field of nuclear weapons, the Administration is determined to "modernize" the strategic arsenal.

The Hawks in Congress and throughout the country would love this portion of the budget. They, for so long felt that the U.S. was behind in the nuclear arms race. The only way to keep peace in the world, the Hawks feel, is a strong army that can match the Soviets weapon-for-weapon.

For military personnel, the new budget means an increase in salary that many servicemen needed and have been asking for many times before.

The Black Leadership Forum (BLF), a group comprised of national black leaders, feels that there is waste and fraud in the defense budget and it is unnecessary to cut social programs.

But according to Administration's budget planners, the larger budget will enable the U.S. to be "second to none" in the arms buildup. But most liberal Congressmen and black leaders would "cringe" at the Administration cutting $11.7 billion in social benefits and $14.2 billion less in discretionary spending.

Let's look at the cuts in social spending: Most social programs will feel the Reagan axe in the budget proposal: Welfare, food stamps, Aid to Dependent Children (ADC), the Comprehensive Employment Training Act (CETA) and public housing will be cut back in the 1983 budget.

Plus, recently during President Reagan's State of the Union Address he proposed sending 47 billion worth of programs back to the states under his "New Federalism" program. The Administration will take over the Medicare program in 1984.

Under the "New Federalism", the president feels that the states can best handle social services instead of the Federal government. Plus, the government has no business, the Administration feels being in the social service business. CETA will be cut by $22 billion and transfered back to the states in form of a block grant.

The Administration would send to the states a $1.8 billion training grants with Job Corps getting $387 million. But other grants that go for training would be cut drastically.

If you are a student and trying to get a grant for college that will be cut back too. A student must qualify as "truly needy" before he can receive aid. A middle class family with a $14,000 income might not qualify under the new rules, because they might not be "truly needy."

Those who receive Social Security under the new budget shouldn't fear because the president isn't cutting it, but will receive an additional 13 billion. Those parents whose children are in the Head Start program shouldn't worry either, that's spared.

But dependents on other programs would see services cut due to 3 billion being slashed off before inflation. If you're a mother with two illegitimate children your budget was cut back last year due to the $1 billion worth of cuts in the program. You will feel more cuts backs in your budget due to $1.1 billion in further cuts.

Plus, the Administration is forcing you, who have only a 11 grade education, to find work right beside the college graduate under the workfare mandatory requirements.

Next year during the cold winter months, she probably can't afford the heat in her apartment due to $1.6 billion worth of cuts in th low-income fuel-aid program.

And, if she receives food stamps she might have to switch to hamburger instead of steaks due to $2.3 billion worth of cuts in the program. What if her children were in need of nutritional assistance? They might have to go a little longer without food, because the Adminstation has cut out the special milk and summer feeding programs, plus curb the breakfast subsidies.

What happens if one of her children become sick and she is a Medicaid recipient? Most health programs will rise by $4.6 billion due to inflation. But for our fictitious mother of two she may suffer due to proposed cuts.
