Eastside drug center controversy continues

An amendment to a bill allowing the relocation of an Eastside drug rehabilitation center gained approval by the City Council Tuesday evening.

The amendment to bill number 794, submitted by Second District councilperson Nathan Irby and Mary Pat Clarke, calls for an annual review of the zoning ordinance which would permit the rehabilitation center to operate in the 1100 block of Aisquith St.

The annual review before the city's zoning board would allow residents a regular opportunity to seek the center's removal if opposition to its continued operation mounted.

"At least (residents) have a forum," Irby said of the annual review process.

"Right now they have no forum. It puts the center on notice it has to run a good ship," the councilman said.

Irby said community uneasiness with the drug rehabilitation center motivated his concern over the center's placement.

The facility, operated by the East Baltimore Community Corporation, was established 10 years ago and currently serves about 300 clients.

The East Baltimore Community Corporation is headed by Councilman Clarence "Du" Burns and state senator Robert L. Douglass, a fact which has injected political overtones into the

The placement of the rehabilitation center has proved to be a controversial issue in the community and in the City Council. Neighborhood groups are divided in their feelings, and even members of the second district's delegation have not been able to agree on how the issue should be handled.

By submitting the bill to relocate the center in the Johnston Square neighborhood Burns drew the opposition of fellow delegation members Irby and Clark.

With the amendment calling for an annual review, however, the bill has won their qualified support.

Monica Towns, office manager of the St. Ambrose Housing Center said her organization opposes the location
