Urban study says city poverty rising

WASHINGTON (UPI) — A recently released new study said that inner city poverty is rising and the administration's urban's policy "that is not to have an urban policy" offers little hope.

Rep. Parren Mitchell, D.-Md., released the new report, entitled "Urban America 1984 — A Report Card," in response to an earlier administration urban policy report that he said was full of "inadequacies and half-truths."

"Some of the data that has been gathered is absolutely horrifying," Mitchell said of the new privately funded study for the bipartisan Joint Economic Committee. It was compiled by a group of largely liberal academics, businessmen and mayors.

"Despite the current economic recovery, poverty is on the rise in every region of the country," the report said. "Between 1980 and 1982, more people entered poverty than in the preceding decade."

But Sen. Steve Symms, R.-Idaho, another member of the committee, issued a statement denouncing the study as "not representative of the views of this committee."

Symms called Mitchell's study "a fiscally irresponsible, partisan proposal which increases government spending and places the burden of providing public services on the backs of the taxpayers."

The report said almost one-third of all the nation's 35 million poor are found in inner cities, that 40 percent of urban residents are dependent solely on federal benefit programs which have been reduced under the Reagan administration, and th unemployment has increased as businesses have relocated in favor of suburban areas.

It also said: "The administration's urban policy is not to have an urban policy. Instead, the president has concluded that cities and their residents would be best served by the effective implementation of the overall plan for economic recovery."

The report was based on a survey of 56 American cities with populations of more than 250,000 over the past fifteen years.

Mitchell said the report will be followed by some specific legislative recommendations for the new Congress to consider, such as a community service employment program, a community housing supply program and a plan to revitalize the nation's street, water and sewage systems.

"Hopefully, it will lead to a re-affirmation by the Congress and by the nation of their long-standing commitments to help cities help themselves and their residents secure a decent quality of life," Mitchell told a news conference.

Annual walk to help hunger victims

November 11 is the date for the First Annual CROP Walk in Baltimore City. The walk is scheduled for Sunday afternoon to give families a chance to walk together and to enable working people to join the 10km hike.

Registration will begin at 1:00 p.m. at Christ Lutheran Church across from the Science Center at the Inner Harbor. Funds raised from the walk will go to fight hunger overseas and at home. home.

Walkers will have the opportunity to stop at local soup kitchens along the walk route and visit with those who serve the hungry. The Open Door Diner at the Dunbar Center is run by Elizabeth Ward and is one of the stops along the route.

Elizabeth opened her kitchen nearly two years ago intending to feed the homeless. She fed 55 people the first evening with $55.67. Word soon spread and she was serving upwards of 400 people a night — the unemployed, mothers and children, the elderly poor. "The love of God makes me want to do for people," she says. "I just got to do for them." But recognizing her limited resources, Elizabeth set up a membership system for people whose income does not exceed $126 a month. The kitchen continues to average 250 people per night.

Of the money raised, 25 percent will go to the Maryland Food Committee to distribute to emergency food centers like the Open Door Diner and others across the state. The other 75 percent will go to Church World Service and other designated overseas agencies to attack the root causes of hunger.

Persons or groups planning to walk will be contacting city residents, church members, businesses, and organizations to ask them to sponsor their walk. If you would like to walk or sponsor a walker, call the Maryland Food Committee at 837-5607.
