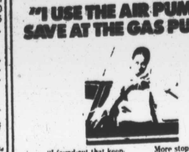
"I USE THE AIR PUMP TO SAVE AT THE GAS PUMP."



"I found out that keeping my tires inflated to the highest level recommended by the manufacturer makes a big difference in my gas mileage. Checking the tire pressure takes just a couple of minutes—and it should save me about 80 gallons of gas this year."

More stops at the air pump will save you stops at the gas pump—and that's just one of the easy ways you can save gasoline. For a free booklet with more tips on saving energy and money, write 'Energy,' Box 62, Oak Ridge, TN 37830.

Wallo: Where the desperate pray food comes before death

By Valerie Strauss

WALLO REGION, Ethiopia - It was cool and dark in the black plastic tent and the air was heavy with an acrid odor. Eight tiny, wrinkled white sacks lay in a neat row on the dirt floor. As my eyes adjusted to the darkness I could make out forms beneath the rough fabric - bodies of children who had starved to death.

In the far corner of the tent, two turbaned workers in white uniforms were standing over a primitive wooden tub, washing yet another body.

It looked like a girl but when children are reduced to skin and bone, individuality is blurred and it is sometimes difficult to tell.

The workers finished and lifted the girl, gently placing her next to another dead child on a blanket a few feet away. The two lay there in almost identical positions, arms crossed on their chests, knees bent, necks crooked.

The children's stomachs were flat, minus the bloated bellies that come with malnutrition. When they were alive, they didn't eat the wrong things - they ate nothing at all.

The heavy smell of decaying flesh jabbed at my stomach; my knees began to get weak. I turned to walk out and bumped into another sack, larger than the others, this time an adult.

Nobody inside the morgue could remember who I had almost tripped over. No name, no age, no identity.

With as many as 120 people a day dying at Bati camp - at least 80 percent of them children - it is no wonder the dead so quickly become anonymous.

At Mile camp, about 90 miles to the northeast, a boy - perhaps 7, ebony skin draped over strong bean-thin bones, a few tufts of hair jutting from his scalp clutched the hand of what looked like his grandfather and tried to walk across the cracked, dusty earth. The pair was headed to the tent where a doctor was screening desperate Afar nomads for food and medical treatment.

The old man - there weren't many of them at any of the camps I visited - tried to help the boy walk.

The child took a step, began to shake: Diarrhea streamed down his legs. He squatted, burying his head in his hands. The man patted the boy's head and watched. Another little boy walked by, stared, continued walking. A donkey sauntered by, oblivious.

The boy tried to stand up again but fell back down; the old man helped him to his feet. The child took one more step, then another, and squatted again. Again up, again down.

The old man knelt and shook him. There was no movement: He shook him again. Nothing. The old man stood up, bowed his head and stood silent.

I thought the boy was dead although sometimes in the refugee camps it is hard to tell.

As I pointed my camera at the boy and the old man, a Red Cross worker angrily grabbed my arm. For God's sake, he said, let the boy die in peace.

Guilty and sickened, I lowered the camera.

Our group had journeyed 9,000 miles by jet to the Horn of Africa, where nearly 8 million Ethiopians are threatened by an unrelenting drought.

Across black Africa, the United Nations says 150 million people face the threat of starvation, victims of misguided land and farming policies, desertification, deforestation, overpopulation and drought. The League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies Puts the number of 185 million.

Traveling in a bus with seven other journalists six workers from various branches of the Red Cross, I saw children, women, men torn from their agricultural and nomadic worlds, driven into a precarious existence where the only thing that matters is the next meal.

Bati, Mile, and Aissaita - these are the "feeding stations" in Ethiopia's parched Wallo region, where thousands have come clinging to their last hope of surviving what may well be the worst human calamity of the century.

The hungry wait for food, the sick wait for medical treatment and all pray the aid will reach them before death does.

More than 16,000 Ethiopians - from the Oromo, Afar and Amharic tribes - live at sprawling Bati camp, 230 miles northeast of Addis Ababa, most of them clustered in a tent city the size of a football stadium. The population has at times swelled to 25,000 and officials worry it may top 50,000.

There are only three doctors and six nurses to handle the hordes, afflicted with pneumonia, malaria, diarrhea, dysentery, amebiasis, dehydration, gastroenteritis and a host of other diseases.

Thirty-two gravediggers spend their days carving big holes in the dry, gray ground on a hill set apart from the main camp. Each mass grave can hold 23 to 25 bodies, depending on whether the victims are adults or children.

Once filled to capacity, the holes are covered with earth and smoothed over to blend with the rest of the hill. The grieving must remember where their loved ones are buried; there are no markers to remind them.

Bati is surprisingly quiet.

The camp is blanketed by a steady hum of conversation, weeping and the buzzing of legions of flies, broken only occasionally by a loud cry or groan.

Life here goes on, or ends, in relative silence. "People can learn to accept anything, it seems," said camp director Masfiti Halefom.

The maternity unit, visitors and relief workers agree, is the most cheerful corner of the camp. New life, they say, always offers new hope.

An average of five babies are born in the unit every day; 15 to 20 mothers in the tent city also give birth daily without medical supervision.

Of the last 62 deliveries in the maternity unit before I arrived, six infants had died before they were 24 hours old, too weakened and diseased to survive. Two mothers had died along with their children.

The day I visited, dozens of pregnant women were bunched inside the corrugated metal structure, some sitting, others laying on the ground waiting for the first signs of labor pains. Some giggled and talked quietly among themselves; others just starred at the ceiling.

As I walked in, I heard a woman groaning: Supine, with her knees bent and slightly spread, the woman was in labor.

Red Cross nurse Elisa Rakonen of Finland was worried the woman might die before giving birth; she had been severely dehydrated when she went into labor the day before.

Cradled in Rakonen's left arm was a boy wrapped in a blanket who had been born prematurely just two hours earlier.

The child, its head covered with a thin, patchy layer of black hair and its skin as wrinkled as a raisin, tried to cry but could muster only a whimper.

Rakonen shook the infant and rubbed his cheeks, trying to coax life into his fragile body.

Come on little one, you can make it," she said over and over.

After a few minutes, Rakonen walked to the back of the tent and handed the child to his 15-year-old mother named Kartouma, suggesting she nurse her son. Kartouma accepted the child but just held him in her arms.

Rakonen took the boy back and shook her head.

"I don't have much hope for this boy," she said. "He was born too premature, too sick."

About 90 miles to the northeast, nearly 4,000 Afar nomads had streamed to a camp still under construction in the desert a few miles outside the town of Mile.

Twisted brush and the branches of scrub trees, withered and bare, form cocoons where the Afars huddle, sheltered against the glaring sun of day and the chill of night. Many hang pieces of cloth from limbs in a futile, pitiful attempt at shade and privacy.

Mile is smaller than Bati but the scene is equally hellish, as raw and barren as the surrounding desert: Tents are half built, there are supplies only for the most vulnerable - children, Pregnant women. Other hungry people have to wait.

With only a quarter the population, Mile is noisier than Bati. Those strong enough produce a cacophony of wails, moans and cough
