Howard students participate in radio station's success

by Henry Duvall

Distributed on the airwaves as "Washington's Superstation," WHUR-FM (96.3) may be a major station in Washington, D.C., but it is also a training ground for Howard University students who "intern" in the station.

Ever since the station was established in 1977, Howard students have been given the opportunity to work in all areas of the station, including the production, programming, sales, marketing, public relations and engineering.

Although, since the station's inception, there has been a good number of students who have gone on to work in the station, the number of students who have gone on to work in the station has increased in the last few years.

Dallas, chief of the 10,000 watts station, said that the station's success is due to the talent it has acquired in its staff.

"We have a very talented staff. We have a good number of people who are very good at what they do," said Dallas.
