APPROXIMATELY 200 Christmas-wrapped books were delivered to South Carolina State's adopted school, Bennett Middle School in Orangeburg. Members of the school's student council gathered in the library to receive the books. Bennett Principal Rebecca Williams thanked the college family and Dr. Lewie C. Roache, made the official presentation (center).

The Gainesville 'Debut'

A group concerned about the lack of cultural activities for black teenaged girls in Alachua County has enlisted the support of the University of Florida community to help college-bound young ladies "debut" into society as they compete for about $1,500 in scholarships.

The Gainesville Cotillion sponsored its third annual debutante ball Dec. 28 at the University Centre Hotel in Gainesville. Traditionally, a debutante ball is a right of passage when young ladies enter womanhood.

The ball helps the girls meet the right people, and helps the right people meet the girls.

"But we've added a little twist to it," said Carolyn Green, UF's affirmative action officer and cotillion president. "It is not only an opportunity to introduce these young ladies to society and culture: it is also an opportunity to teach them things we think all young girls should know."

During the cotillion season, which begins in September and culminates with the ball in December, the cotillion takes the debutantes to cultural events like art exhibits and plays.

The group also holds workshops and activities for the girls to teach them things about dating attitudes and behavior, community morals, women in black history and even writing and communication skills.

"We call on the University of Florida to help us quite a lot," Green said. "The human resources we have here and the people of various expertise help us reach out to the community and encourage these kids to excel and learn how to face the world."

Green said people in the UF community help the cotillion by acting as role models for the girls, "encouraging them to be something and to use their education to bring something back to the community."

And that's exactly what the cotillion encouraged UF student Denise John to do. She participated in the cotillion last year. This year she is helping the younger girls by showing them how the cotillion can prepare them for life.

I'm there to show the others that you can make it," John said. "Even though it's hard, you have to go for it.

"The cotillion is good for the girls because many don't get the recognition they deserve. This is a way the community can recognize them for their achievements."

Green said John was an example of one way the cotillion is trying to help college-bound girls: "We are hoping that the girls who take part in past cotillions can come back to meet the new girls, act as role models and show that things like the cotillion can work."

Green said the cotillion got its start in 1984. She was sitting around with Bill Simmons, director of UF's Institute of Black Culture, and some other friends.

"We didn't think there were stimulating things happening culturally in this county," Green recollects. "We wanted to do something for the girls in the community, and we came up with the idea of the cotillion. We came together solely for this purpose."

So now, every summer, the group gets a list of all 11th-grade black girls in Alachua County. They choose about 10 of them based on their academic records, community and school involvement, and recommendations from teachers and guidance counselors.

The group invites these girls to participate in the cotillion's season and to attend the activities and workshops. Judges give the girls points based on academic records, a written essay, participation in the program and enthusiasm. The top girls of the 1985 season divided about $1,500 in scholarships.

"We know these girls are college-bound," Green said, "and we want to get them started on the right track."

The Best Band in the Land

TALLAHASSEE, Fla.—What do you do when the organization you've headed for the past 40 years is named the best in the country? When the local newspaper runs an editorial thanking you for being a citizen of your town?

When the governor and cabinet, and the senate of your state pass resolutions in your honor, the Rotary Club gives you a special recognition, and 350 former members of your outfit from all across the U.S. turn up to "roast" you—at a seated dinner planned for 275 guests?

If you happen to be Dr. William Patrick Foster, director of music and bands at Florida Agricultural and Mechanical University, you smile a lot.

"I'm highly elated," said the man who made FAMU's "Marching 100" synonymous with marching band excellence. "I so appreciate the tremendous response from all over, and can't begin to express my gratitude for all the plaudits and accolades heaped on me, and on the band."

The centerpiece of Homecoming Week at FAMU was the presentation of the John Philip Sousa Foundation's coveted "Sudler Trophy," considered the Heisman of marching band awards.

The annual award is made to a "college or university marching band which has demonstrated the highest of musical standards and innovative marching routines" and contributed to raising the performance standards of college marching bands over an extended period.

The winner is chosen by balloting college marching band directors throughout the country, and the award has been made only three times before: to the University of Michigan, the University of Illinois and the Ohio State University marching bands.

On hand for the halftime presentation were Florida Governor Bob Graham; Dr. Al G. Wright, Sousa Foundation president; and the award's donor, Chicago businessman and arts patron Louis Sudler.

"I heard the greatest band in the United States today," said Sudler, who praised Foster and the 'Marching 100' for their originality and sensitivity to what marching bands are all about, and held them up as an example of enthusiasm and dedication.

The band—and Foster—have come a long way since the day in 1946 when he faced the 45 returning World War II veterans on the practice field of what was then Florida A&M College; but Foster had a dream even then.

"I wanted to see 100 bandsmen: proud, uniformed, marching like drum-majors or a crack drill-team—and playing to the highest musical standard anywhere."

From that vision came the name, the "Marching 100," which has remained unchanged, though the band now numbers more than 215 members.

But the high point of the numerous activities that made up "Sudler Week" at FAMU was, for Foster, the band alumni's grand reunion banquet and roast.

"The response was incredible," he said. "And most wonderful of all was to be able to renew friendships formed so many years ago. Why, there were six or seven there from that first band."

On the inside page of the banquet program is the band motto—the ideas that Foster has distilled into a few, simply-stated, but challenging guiding principles: highest quality of character, achievement in academics, attainment in leadership, perfection of musicianship, precision in marching and dedication to service.

One of Foster's former bandsmen who attributes much of his success to those principles is Colonel Bernard D. Hendricks, U.S. Army., Hendricks, who commands FAMU's Army ROTC Unit, served as local chairman for the Band Alumni Reunion Committee.

Recalling his years with the "Marching 100," Hendricks said, "I learned more from Dr. Foster and the band staff about achieving a standard of excellence, and about the importance of completing a mission, than from any other experiences, courses or activities that I had in college."

"The closeness and comaraderie of the bandmembers seemed much deeper than even those of fraternity brothers. We were family. The friendships I formed that have stood the test of 22 years," he added.

William Patrick Foster is a man of many years. Known as "Bill" to his professional colleagues, "Pat" to his immediate friends, and "The Law" to nearly four-decades of bandmembers. Foster is a man of iron discipline, who embodies the best characteristics of leadership and professionalism.

"He was 'The Law,'" Hendricks said. "He created an image of being the epitome of leadership. His character, his dress, his speech, his facial expressions and body language all reinforced that image. And he never did anything to detract from what he represented. He always used formal forms of address to the band members, never used profanity— he never even raised his voice."

In his forty-odd years as a band director, Foster has appeared as an adjudicator, conductor, clinician, lecturer and consultant in more than 30 states and 45 colleges and universities. He is the author of the textbook "Band Pageantry, considered to be the bible on Marching bands; 18 articles and our published marching band shows.

Honors are not new to Foster. He has twice before been commended by legislative resolutions in Florida—in 1977 and in May of this year—for his lifetime of superior achievement and service.

He has received distinguished service awards from the University of Kansas, his alma mater, and from Florida A&M University and the Kappa Kappa Psi fraternity.

He was the first recipient of the U.S. Achievement Academy Hall of Fame Award and is past president of the Florida Music Educators Association and the College Band Directors National Association.

The "Marching 100," for which Foster has created more than 200 band pageants, has appeared in three films, three national commercials, numerous magazine and newspaper articles, network television shows "60-Minutes," "20/20," and "PM Magazine," and in 34 nationally televised performances including the Super Bowl.

With all that—and the Sudler Intercollegiate Marching Band Trophy—what does Foster forsee for himself and the "Marching 100?"

"Perhaps more of the same," he says, disarmingly. "I am an extreme optimist, you know. I am always planning a long way in the future."

Oil Corporation donates to Scholarship Fund

A $3,000 grant was awarded to Fort Valley State College by the Cities Services Oil and Gas Corporation of Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Mr. Joseph R. Huffstetler, Manager, College Relations and Recruiting, Cities Services Oil and Gas Corporation, presented the check to Dr. Luther Burse, President of Fort Valley State College on Friday, December 13, 1985.

The grant awarded to the college is part of a grant given to three historically black colleges.

Fort Valley State College's affiliation with Cities Services Oil and Gas Corporation grew out of the Cooperative Development Energy Program at the college which is designed to prepare students for potential employment in energy related industries.

According to Huffstetler, areas of opportunity are in accounting and computer science and high tech fields. Opportunities for students in the fine arts are limited but hopefully, companies will come to appreciate those who are in fine arts and can offer a wide variety of skills. Ways are being explored to use these skills that persons in non-technical areas offer.

Technical information and technical writing are areas that are rapidly being opened by companies throughout the country.

Because of the need for companies to maintain a good public image, public relations is another area in which there are job opportunities for non-technical personnel.

"Students should consider relocation when seeking employment," Huffstetler said. "The wage base in oil industry is one of the highest in industry. Life styles can be tailored to fit the career opportunity," he added.

USDA visits SCSC

ORANGEBURG, SC — Alexander King and William Toney talked with South Carolina State College agribusiness and economic majors about career opportunities.

King, a graduate of S.C. State in 1968 is agricultural program specialists in the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service. He distributed tests related to agriculture terms and a multiple choice questionnaire on a variety of agricultural related categories.

He then pointed out many kinds of jobs related to the programs in the government, many more simplified than the former dragging of a chain to determine acreage, such as modern photographic maps.

"Remember, somebody has to be in that plane flying over the land taking that picture," he said. "That is another kind of job related to agriculture, and there are many more."

Toney, also a graduate of the college, Class of 1969, urged students to take as many courses as possible in many areas such as letter writing and public speaking.

"Above all, develop satisfaction in doing a good job," he said. "Employers want people who want to do a good job. I am not minimizing the need for good skills, but you have got to want to do a good job," he concluded.

The agribusiness program was approved at the college and implemented two years ago, Dr. Carl Carpenter, vice president for academic affairs, told students and the department is now working on the master's portion of the program which probably will be in place next year.

The speakers were introduced by Donald McLellan, a senior agribusiness major from Manning.
