Tough being legislators called it "The Wimp Bill," and refused to deal with the issues that it raised.

Cummings decided that perhaps the climate might be more favorable in 1987.

But repeated support from his constituents helped him to change his mind. And, Cummings said that his legislators were beginning to come to him, acknowledging that he might be on to something.

"I found that a lot of male legislators recognized that there were a lot of problems with men, but they didn't want to touch it because they didn't want to offend women," said Kammer.

"We're not in a battle with our female counterparts," said Richard Rowe. "We must begin to look at ourselves to understand why we act the way we do."

The bill would establish a 16-member task force that would examine problems facing the modern man.

"We're looking to redefine the meaning of manhood," said Rowe.

Apparently, other states, are looking to do likewise. Cummings said that he's spoken with people from at least 43 other states. "Maryland is basically taking the lead in this thing," he said.

With memories of the bill's past defeat, Cummings said this time, they're taking a different approach. "This bill deals with the major problems of life. If we as legislators stand by and look the other way, we're being foolish."

The efforts in the state legislator might get a little boost from many social scientists who indicate that the country is returning to old-fashioned values of home and family.

Jack Kammer thinks that the bill has a very good chance of passing. "If it doesn't succeed, it will be because the assembly will be distracted by the S&L crisis," he observed.

Perhaps the assembly would welcome a change of pace this bill might bring.

General Assembly

banks would not."

Outside, in the bitter cold, several hundred bitter S&L depositors, unable to get their monies from several area savings and loans, called for the head, and other parts of Governor Harry Hughes' anatomy.

Along with the S&L crisis, the assembly will address among others, health, education, housing, and the insurance industry.

In his opening day remarks, Speaker of the House, Benjamin Cardin said, "We need insurance reform this year."

"In liability insurance, there are too few companies writing policies for premiums which are much too high. All of us are paying the cost of those premiums."

Cardin chided the Reagan Administration for its lack of a national housing initiative and urged the delegates to "set priorities for coherent state housing programs."

The health issues are certain to delight Del. Larry Young. Young, chairman of the House Environmental Committee, is hoping to assemble a task force to examine the problem of minority health care.

In prefiled bills, Young is seeking to prohibit the State Health Services Cost Review Commission from initiating a fate review for acute care hospitals to force the hospital to consolidate, merge with another hospital or close until January 15, 1987. The bill would be good news to a hospital like Provident.

Another health matter due to get some attention this session is Alzheimer's Disease.

Sen. Clarence W. Blount, (D-41st), has prefiled some 16 bills regarding the disease which would, among other things, require that the state provide financial assistance to care givers who keep persons suffering from the disease, require a demographic study concerning the disease's prevalence and related disorders, and would require that all health insurers, profit and non-profit, include benefits for expenses arising from the care of victims of Dementia. Dementia is a major symptom of the disease.

Sen. Blount is also seeking to have each professional school at the state's higher institutions to develop a gerontology program which would include the study of the disease.

This session will be the last for Del. Elijah Cummings as chairman of the Maryland Legislative Black Caucus and it's been rumored that Sen. Blount might become the next caucus chair. He is no stranger to the seat, as he was caucus chairman prior to Cummings.

Mystery persists

ple from the neighborhood, etc., but they don't come forward . . . "The man is still free," said an excited and distraught sister of Stokes, Renee Walker.

According to witnesses, the driver would never have stopped if the victims' body hadn't been trapped under the car with his coat locked into the brakes. "He dragged the body two blocks trying to get away," she said. Adding, "Duvall's body stopped that car, not the driver."

The AFRO has not, in one week, been able to secure any concrete statement from official agencies here. Baltimore City Police, Public Information Agent Arline Jenkins, said all fatal accidents and severe injuries are automatically turned over to the State's Attorney's Office for determinations, which could take several weeks, she said.

Several attempts were made to contact Floyd Bond of the State's Attorney's Traffic Division, to no avail.

Attempts to contact the Traffic Investigation Unit of the police department were not fruitful. Each officer contacted deferred to another officer who could not be contacted.

A month has passed, give or take a few days, and nothing has happened, or reports have yet to surface to satisfy the growing concern of those who knew Stokes.

The victim's family was not informed of the fatal accident until days later (Sunday), because Stokes had left his wallet at home, according to his mother. He only had two telephone numbers on his person, numbers of other musicians. He was identified by his brother Sunday (Dec. 15) at the City Morgue.

Friends describe Stokes as a dedicated musician and a great human being.

"He was a vegetarian man. He didn't smoke or drink," said El-Amin.

"He was a prolific musician. It was always a blessing to have him play with us," said William Goffigan, fellow musician and quartet leader.

"He was dedicated to the music. He would go to any length to play . . . He would be there," said Freddie Thaxton, another musician who used to play with Stokes at the Jazz Closet, a club on Franklin Street.

Thaxton described Stokes as a clean-cut type.
